Joint resolution (H. R. 130) to distribute copies of special memoirs and reports of the United States Geological Survey;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 138) to print 10,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture on the International Sheep and Wool Show held in Philadelphia in September, 1880; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 201) for printing the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 5,000 copies of the navigation and customs-collection laws relating to vessels, including the laws relating to merchant seamen and the regulation of steam vessels, compiled by the Bureau of Navigation in the Treasury Department.

OHIO VALLEY RAILROAD BRIDGE.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent to take up another bridge bill. The Senator from Michigan desired to call it up, but had not time. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 2800) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers by the Ohio Valley Railway Company.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read.

Mr. BECK. I have only to say that the bill meets the approval of the Engineer Department and of the Secretary of War, and is the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST. I did not pay very strict attention to the reading of the bill, but I did not hear any provision in the bill that if the bridge should not be commenced and built within a certain time then the charter should be void. I think that ought to be put in all these bridge bills.

Mr. BECK. I am not sure that it is in, but the road is finished to the bridge on both ends and it will be completed by December. They are only waiting for the bridge. The road is finished on both sides from Jackson, Tenn., to Aurora, and the bridge will be up by December. There will be no trouble about it.

Mr. VEST. I find that there is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. BECK. I did not observe it. I suppose the reason why it was omitted is because the road has been built on both sides and they are only waiting for the bridge.

Mr. VEST. I move to insert those words.

Mr. BECK. There will be no objection to that. It will be finished in time.

Mr. LOGAN. Simply insert a proviso that the bridge shall be built in a certain time.

Mr. VEST. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the bridge authorized to be constructed by this act shall be commenced within twelve months from the passage of this act, and completed within three years from the same date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY CLERKS AND MESSENGERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to take the time of the Senate for just a moment to call up the bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers" in the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLER. I reserve the right to object if it leads to any debate.

Mr. LOGAN. It will lead to no debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "headquarters," to insert the words "at headquarters general service, at recruiting depots, and at West Point, New York;" and, in lines 8 and 9, to strike out "one hundred and forty-eight" and insert "one hundred and seventy;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, for clerical service and messenger duty at the headquarters of the Army and at the several division, department, and district headquarters, at headquarters general service, at recruiting depots, and at West Point, N. Y., in the Army, a corps of men not to exceed one hundred and seventy, who shall be subject to the Articles of War and Army Regulations the same as enlisted men on duty in the line, but shall not be subject to be assigned to any other than clerical and messenger duty, as hereinbefore specified; nor shall this number be computed as a part of the number at which the Army is now limited by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 2, to strike out "one hundred and three" and insert "one hundred and twenty-five;" in line 3, to strike out "sixty-six" and insert "ninety;" and in line 11, to strike out "bi-monthly" and insert "monthly;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That of the men so enlisted one hundred and twenty-five shall be "general-service clerks," who shall be classified and paid as follows: Class 1 shall consist of ninety clerks, at $1,000 per annum; class 2 shall consist of twenty-five clerks, at $1,100 per annum; class 3 shall consist of ten clerks, at $1,200 per annum; and the remaining forty-five of such men shall be "general-service messengers," who shall be paid at the rate of $60 per month; and all of such men shall be mustered for pay monthly the same as enlisted men, and shall receive no other compensation, pay, or allowance, except when on duty, when necessity requires, they shall each be allowed for subsistence one ration in kind, to be issued by the Commissary Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer an amendment suggested by the War Department. I move to strike out seetion 3, in the following words:

That the provisions of law relating to the retirement of enlisted men shall be construed to include "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers."

And to insert:

That the provisions of law relating to the retirement of enlisted men shall be construed to include "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers," and for the purposes of retirement they shall rank as follows: General-service clerks of class 3 with first sergeants of the line, general-service clerks of class 2 with sergeants of the line, general-service clerks of class 1 with corporals of the line, general-service messengers with privates of the line.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Illinois what pay they will get?

Mr. LOGAN. They will get the pay that is allowed now by law to that class.

Mr. SEWELL. The sergeants and corporals?

Mr. LOGAN. The sergeants and corporals.

Mr. SEWELL. Not in proportion to their present pay as clerks and messengers?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; that was suggested by the War Department so as to give them the grade that will be recognized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 87) providing for the printing and distribution of documents of the monetary conferences of 1878 and 1881;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 129) directing the Public Printer to forward the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to our legations abroad;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 130) to distribute copies of special memoirs and reports of the United States Geological Survey;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 138) to print 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture on the International Sheep and Wool Show held in Philadelphia in September, 1880;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 120) to print the annual bulletins of the Bureau of Ethnology; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 201) for printing the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

NAVIGATION AND CUSTOMS COLLECTION LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the navigation and customs-collection laws relating to vessels, including the laws relating to merchant seamen, and the regulation of steam-vessels, compiled by the Bureau of Navigation in the Treasury Department; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Navigation.

BUTTER AND OLEOMARGARINE.

The Senator, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter; also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, of all dangerous legislation that has been enacted or attempted to be enacted since I have had the honor of being a member of this body, it strikes me that this bill, commonly called the oleomargarine bill, is the most dangerous. It strikes me that it is the most violative, outrageously violative of the Constitution and of the safety to individual and personal rights which the Constitution is intended to preserve. It is literally protection gone to seed. It is literally the doctrine that the taxing power of the Government may be used for private purposes carried to its logical and legitimate extent.

Some years ago, while I had the honor to be governor of my native State, it became my province to inaugurate fish-culture in that State for the purpose of restocking its exhausted streams with fish. Of course I consulted the scientific men and the experts, and having expressed a preference for the introduction of the black bass rather than any other foreign fish into our waters, I was reminded by an eminent scientist in that department that that was a most dangerous experiment. I wanted to know why. "Why," said he, "the first thing that the black bass do when put into a stream is to clean out every other fish in it." "So much the better," said I. "No," said he, "but wait; after they have cleaned out every other fish in the stream, and every frog, and every eel, and every tadpole, and every living thing in the water, then they will begin with one another, and they will soon clean each other out." [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the doctrine of protection is the black bass of American politics. It began on this article and that article and the other to exclude foreign competition, and having succeeded in imposing a protective tariff upon more than four thousand articles, and raising the price of every one known to human wants or to human consumption that comes at all in competition with anything made in this country, it has now begun to devour its own species. Having exhausted the foreigner and utterly annihilated him, and having prohibited by taxation the last item in the long-extended list of articles competing with our American labor, it now begins on American labor itself. Having exhausted the English language in eulogy of the legislation which encourages American industry, for lack of a foreign aliment it now begins to eat up American industry.

I have taken occasion several times to express my admiration for what I have always regarded the stalwart, practical business sense of the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. I now have to add to that admiration my extreme gratification of his candor, for he is the first Senator I have ever heard on this floor openly proclaim in his advocacy of a bill of this sort that he wanted no revenue. He says, "I have no desire to introduce such a bill for taxation; I want no money from this bill in the Treasury; I want protection to the dairy interest of New York; I want the taxing power used not to raise revenue but to promote the interests of my people in New York; and I want it, and I say that I want it to go so far as to exterminate this rival industry if necessary." That is an extremity of candor on which I congratulate the Senator.

The bill is very harmless on its face so far as its constitutionality is concerned. It is entitled "A bill to define butter" and I do not remember what else, but the provision is to raise revenue by taxing all imitations of butter. The Senator availing himself thus of the constitutionality of a revenue bill comes before us and repudiates the revenue feature and says that he does not want a dollar and that all his purposes are ulterior. He says that it is the duty of the Government to protect all its people against fraud and against such foods, &c., as will be injurious to the public health. Where is that to stop if we once inaugurate that doctrine? If we once invade the police powers of the States and undertake to go down into private and domestic life and regulate all the relations of the people one with another and take charge of everything that is fraudulent or everything that is injurious to the public health, where shall we stop?

The very first blow would be one directed at one of the prime interests of New England. We are now invited and urged as far as possible to enter into a quarrel with Great Britain and if necessary to fight her, to turn our splendid Navy upon our rival and drive her from the sea! What for? In order that New England Yankees may catch in Canadian waters Canadian red herring with which to make French sardines. What would become of that fishing interest if we were to apply the doctrine of the suppression of fraud in that way? What would become of the New England fisheries if judgment were to begin at the house of the Lord, and every man was required, as the citizens of Jerusalem were, to keep the street clean by sweeping before his own door? Next we should have to interfere with a very considerable and enormous interest by forbidding the use of sulphate of baryta, which is extensively used for the purpose of adulterating white lead. Next we should have a lick at kaolin and forbid the use of those extensive beds of that article in South Carolina, which are so largely applied by the sugar refiners in New York in the adulteration of the candy on which our children feed.

Next we should have to invade regions where the glucose is made, which is used for the purpose of adulterating molasses. Then we should have to forbid wines of all kinds that have any kind of mixture or adulteration in them. We might then turn our attention to the hotels, and, with long-delayed justice, arrest every landlord who deceives travelers with coffee adulterated with chicory. Again, we should have to invade every manufacturing establishment of tobacco in the country and arrest every one who adulterated or mixed his tobacco with licorice; and then we should have to invade every fertilizer manufacturing establishment in the United States and investigate the frauds—and they are very extensive ones—perpetrated in the manipulation of commercial fertilizers.

Finally, we should have to get down to the inexpressible and inscrutable mysteries of boarding-house hash and link sausage. There would be no stopping short of that. And on the score of health we should have to forbid the manufacture of pickled pork or the use of pork in any way for fear of trichinosis. We should even have to go into all the towns and villages of the United States, including this great disfranchised village of Washington, and forbid the sale on the market of stale vegetables, green apples and green watermelons, which so afflict the juvenile population of this country at certain seasons of the year.

That is the task which is now proposed to this great Government by principles of this bill. This is the initial step; but we should not stop there. Having exhausted all of the catalogue of rival competitors against whom there could be made any allegation of fraud or unwholesomeness in their products on the general principle of the public good, attempts would be made to extinguish any product in the world that competed with another that was not exactly of the same material. For instance, the woolen interest of the country might take it into their heads to combine and secure the passage of a law by Congress forbidding the use and manufacture of any goods that were part wool and part cotton, on the pretense that they were retailed as all wool, or any goods that were part silk and part linen, as poplin.

Any pretext whatever to show that an article was being put on the community for one thing when it was not, but was really something else, would be sufficient to invoke legislation and the power of Congress to suppress it, notwithstanding that something else was just as good and a great deal cheaper.

And then the greed of men would not let them stop. The black bass must still be fed. Wherever an industry could combine sufficient strength to crush out its rival on any pretext, or without any pretext, there is no reason to say that it will not be done. If we set this precedent, it is to result in the crushing of all business that competes with another stronger business, not by manufacturing the same product but by manufacturing products which were used as substitutes therefor. In other words, it would result not in Mr. Darwin's doctrine of the survival of the fittest, but the survival of the strongest and the unfittest; because any business that comes to this Congress and invokes the arm of the law to keep it alive at the expense of another honest business is, in my opinion, unfit to live, so that this would result in the survival of the unfittest.

There is no limit to this doctrine of protection when you once fairly embark upon it and get away from the Constitution, which prescribes that no tax can be levied except for public purposes.

> Protection's battle once begun,
> Bequeathed by bowling sire to son,
> Only can be fought and won
> By taxing every son of a gun, in the name of "American labor!"

There is no safety, sir, I repeat, except within the doctrines of the Constitution; and whenever you once depart from the plain principle that taxation can only be levied on a free people for public purposes, then the only limit that there is upon taxation for private purposes will be in the power or want of power necessary to accomplish that legislation; and we have seen how that power can be gathered by combinations of one interest and another asking for the same thing.

They say the States can not do this. I do not believe it, Mr. President. There is, however, this to be said, that if the States can not do it, the Government of the United States can not do it rightfully, because what the States have the power to do rightfully and can not do, the Government of the United States can only do wrongfully, if at all.

The State of North Carolina was for many years imposed upon very greatly by fraudulent commercial fertilizers until the ills and abuses got to be so great that the matter was taken in hand by the Legislature. There was no appeal to the Congress of the United States; but the Legislature of the State itself enacted laws upon the subject, and they required every manufacturer who sold goods in the State to take out a license and to submit a sample of all his products to a chemist employed by the State, whose duty is was to analyze them. And it was enacted that all the goods should be branded, specifically designating what they were or purported to be, and if upon analysis by the State chemist the goods did not come up to what was written upon the label purporting to be its contents they were forfeited to the State.

There never was a more successful law enacted in any State than that has been. It completely threw out all improper fertilizers from the market, and again and again we have had the happiness of congratulating ourselves upon the complete success of the State in preventing frauds and impositions upon our people. Why can not that be done in any State that feels aggrieved by the manufacture and sale of this oleomargarine? Surely if the State can not do it the Government ought not to be able to do it. The very fact that the Government would be unable to enforce a law is evidence that that law ought not to be enforced. The fact of its refusal to be enforced ought to be taken as a protest of political economy against the violation of one of her laws which such legislation is.

Another very great objection, as it seems to me, to this bill is the introduction of still more Federal revenue officials into our homes. One of the greatest abuses and oppressions that my people have ever experienced since their reconstruction and restoration to the Union of their fathers has been the presence and the conduct of the internal-revenue officers of this Government, as I have had occasion more than once on this floor to speak of. Now it is proposed in addition to having a storekeeper and a gauger or a revenue official in every orchard and in every little still-house mashing three or four barrels of corn per day, to have the additional officers necessary to carry out this butter law.

It is proposed to leave all these regulations to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and what they will be we can judge by the existing regulations with regard to the tax on spirits and tobacco. We should have every door in the country guarded by a revenue official. We shall have on every hearth-stone in the land a Government spy; and the shadow of governmental interference would blacken every home in the land if this principle is carried out. I am opposed to it, sir, not only on account of its unconstitutionality but on account of its inexpediency and the oppression which it will bring about. It seems to me that every old woman's churn in the land would have to be watched lest oleo oil or butterine should be mixed with the product, and every spring-house on every homestead would be subject to be raided by rude officials armed with six-shooters, by United States marshals and warrants, in search of "crooked" butter!

The Senator from New York, as if conscious of the extraordinary, if not outrageous, character of this bill, prefaced his advocacy of it by many apologies. He said the dairy interest was declining, and he read us figures to show us how it was declining. He said that ruin stared them in the face and something must be done. The exigencies of the case, he said, absolutely required that something should be done. What was that something? Legislation of course. The Government of the United States is to be made a hospital for decayed and diseased industries, and every man who starts an enterprise and finds that by reason of competition or from some other cause it can not be successfully carried through, instead of abandoning it and undertaking something else that he can carry through successfully, falls back upon the Government and calls for legislation to help him. He calls for taxation upon his neighbors to supply his want of business tact or his want of success generally. Legislation is to be the remedy for every business failure. Every enterprise which can not walk is to be carried.

A hundred things during your own lifetime, Mr. President, and mine have been invented and brought into general use that conflicted seriously with some established product of manufacturers or have absolutely driven it out of existence. That has been the result of what we call the advancement of science. If now every time that science makes an improvement in our condition or adds anything to the common comforts and support and civilization of mankind, the industry which is supplanted by that improvement has to be supported and carried along by public taxation, in defiance of economical principles, had we not better abandon all attempts to promote science and be done with it? Had we not better abolish our Patent Office and all of its laws and institutions? Had we not better abolish our Geological Survey? Had we better not abolish our Coast Survey, our Agricultural Department, and all the other methods of pursuing and promoting science which we now spend so much money upon, if the result is to be that every disabled and diseased and broken-down product the manufacture of which is supplanted by advancing science is to be supported by public taxation? It seems so to me. If we carry our dead with us we shall travel neither far nor fast.

But as the Senator from New York was so candid as right in the face of his printed bill to assign an entirely different motive from that named in the bill, would he not be candid enough to go a little further and make an acknowledgment to the Senate in relation to those "exigencies" which call for such a bill? Is not that "exigency" chiefly found in the necessity of providing a measure by which they can carry New York in the next Presidential campaign? It seems so to me, and if the Senator's candor would not forsake him I would calculate upon having an affirmative response. That is one of the exigencies which surround this case and demand this extraordinary measure, I am quite sure.

Now, when the example is set that all competition is to be suppressed by law and the demand for such laws is almost universal, what wonder that other men who can not procure this legislation undertake to suppress competition in their own way, and become strikers, who not only refuse to labor, but who go to the doors of the shops and manufactories which they have abandoned and refuse to let any other men enter and labor in their places. What difference is there between this kind of legislation, brought in here by the dairy interests of the country at the expense of all other interests, and the club and revolver of the striker, who stations himself at the door of the workshop and refuses to let a non-union man earn his bread? I confess that as much as I abhor both, I have infinitely more respect for the club of the striker than I have for the legislative sneak of the protectionist. One is manly and open and acknowledges itself to be a violation of the law and takes all the consequences. The other is an attempt by a perversion of law and the Constitution of the country to secure an advantage over its rivals that nothing can justify.

Mr. President, pursuing the usual course in such cases, we have been told here a great deal and very eloquently by the Senator from New York about the magnitude of this interest, about the greatness of the dairy farms of the country, about the great amount, so many billions of gallons of milk each year, so many hundreds of millions of pounds of butter and cheese manufactured and shipped abroad, and the part each had played in keeping up the balance of trade in our favor, and so forth, and so forth, and so on. What has that to do with it, Mr. President? The greatness and magnitude of an interest involved has nothing whatsoever to do with the legality and constitutionality of crushing by law a rival interest. It has much to do, I acknowledge, with that "exigency" to which the Senator referred, as demanding this kind of legislation, but it has nothing to do with either the justice or constitutionality involved in this question.

I acknowledge the greatness of the cow. I acknowledge my indebtedness to the cow, which was one of my first acquaintances, and I must say to the Senate that great as she is, and wonderful as her products are, and beneficent as she has been to the human family, I can not be made to violate the plain principles of the Constitution and the plainer principles of political economy for the sake of protecting her products. It is suggested, why should we protect one end of the cow at the expense of the other?

Mr. GRAY. Why should we protect the udder of the cow at the expense of her ribs?

Mr. VANCE. Very well put. Why is the product of her udder any more entitled to our respect and protection than the product of her ribs when it comes in the shape of a beefsteak? In other words, why is not the cow as great and useful when dead as when living? It seems that she is greater, for if the Senator from New York is to be believed, like Samson her death has caused greater destruction than all her lifetime wrought—the more cows slaughtered the worse the chance of the living, or rather the less the value. Those Senators over there know quite as well as I do that this bill is an outrage. Then why do they not do their duty by voting against it? The reasons are "exigencies" and butter! Butter, like conscience, "doth make cow-herds of them all." [Laughter.] The necessity of grease to carry New York two years from now is what makes cowards of them all. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not believe this interest is declining, but if it is declining I do not believe that it is any more entitled to help than any other interest that is declining; for there is hardly a product known to our production in this country exhibited upon our markets but that has declined in the same ratio that the product of the cow has declined. But let the Senator from New York console himself with the thought that his favorite animal, the cow, is so great that no other interest in the world could injure her but herself or her own progeny. Let him take comfort in the boast of one of the ancient panegyrici, who, in addressing the Emperor Theodosius about the greatness and power of Rome and reciting her struggles with rivals and triumphs over enemies, closed with this burst of gratulation:

To whom the party madness of thy own children had wrought in every age heavier woe than the Carthagenian thundering at thy gates, or the Gaul admitted within thy walls; on whom Emathia, more fatal than the day of Allia—Collina, more dismal than Cannæ—had inflicted such deep memorials of wounds, that, from bitter experience of thy own valor, no enemy was to thee so formidable as thyself.

Let the Senator reflect that the glories of his favorite animal, though waning in the pastures of New York, are waxing mightier day by day in the wider prairies of the West; and that no enemy to her has been so formidable as herself. Let him commemorate the virtues of his lost New York love and bewail the coming of the Western charmer by reciting the touching lines of the great poet, Byron, upon the lesser one, but purer and better man, Kirk White:

Oh! what a noble cow was here undone,
When Brindle's self destroyed her favourite son!
Yes, she too much indulged thy fond pursuit,
She sow'd the seeds, but death has reap'd the fruit.
'T was thine own genius gave the final blow,
And help'd to plant the wound that laid thee low:
So the struck milker stretch'd upon the plain,
No more through waving grass to browse again,
View'd her own tallow on the fatal dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in her heart.

[Laughter.]

Yes, sir; it was her own tallow that brought her to grief. Mr. President, is it possible that the American Senate is called on to declare that there must be no competition between the product of the living cow and the product of the dead cow? Must the Senate of the United States take sides with the very limited portion of the farming interest of this country which raises cattle for the purposes of milk and butter against all that great and wide and expanded and ever-increasing interest which rears cattle for the purpose of feeding mankind; and must it decree the loss of $3 per head on every one slaughtered for food in order to increase to something like the same extent the profits of every one kept for milk? If that is not an economical question great enough to rive the world asunder, I should like to know what is. I approach it with fear and trembling. There is no use in attempting to appeal to Senators on this side on the ground that the bill is in the interests of the farmer. There are ten farmers raising cattle for food to one raising for milk. The farmer owns the live cow and the farmer owns the dead one—one owns the milk, the other owns the flesh. All questions of constitutionality and expediency aside, and fair play says to me hands off, and hands off it is with all true friends of the farmer.

I will not go into the statistics. We all know that so long as human prejudices imbibed in childhood are continued pure butter never will be interfered with by artificial butter. We all know from reading this extended report of testimony taken before the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate that not one man in ten of all those who use oleomargarine would be able to purchase high-priced butter if there were no competition. With them it is a question as to whether they shall have artificial butter or whether they shall have no butter.

We know the fact also, as we are bound to know, that it is not an unwholesome product. We know the fact that nearly every one of the scientific men who appeared before this committee testified that the same ingredients which are found in the one are to be found in the other, and that oleomargarine butter was both cheap and wholesome.

We know all these facts. So there is not a single question of right or justice, there is not a question of expediency, there is not a question of constitutional law but what when fairly stated militates against this bill, and the only appeal that is made or can be made by its advocates is simply to protect an interest that has been damaged by competition.

So, sir, it seems to me that it is not safe to embark on this kind of legislation. That it is safest to leave these questions of what people shall eat and what they shall drink and what they shall wear to the regulation of their own States, if any regulation be necessary, and that the Government of the United States should confine itself to questions strictly within its power as granted by the Constitution of the United States, to the great questions of national import, and not undertake to follow up these little fragmentary matters such as regulating the competition of one man with another or giving one business by law an advantage over another. To do so we might as well abolish State lines at once and destroy their autonomy forever.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer an amendment as new sections what I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

SEC. —. That for the purposes of this act the words "pure wines" shall be understood to mean the juice of grapes, apples, or other fruits fermented, prepared, perfected, preserved, or fortified for use as beverages according to methods recognized by competent authority as legitimate and approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and wines produced under such approved methods shall, for the purposes of this act, be held to be pure according to the standard of the United States.

SEC. —. That for the purposes of this act certain manufactured liquors and certain mixtures and compounds, including such mixtures and compounds with pure wine, shall be known and designated as "compounded liquors," namely: All articles, except pure wines, in the nature of beverages known as wines; all articles, except pure wines, in the nature of beverages known by names which, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, indicate that they are intended to be sold as or for wine, or that they are to be compounded with liquors intended to be so sold; all articles in the nature of beverages, except pure wines and malt liquors, containing alcohol produced by fermentation; all articles in the nature of beverages containing alcohol obtained by distillation, except pure wines, and also except distilled spirits, cordials, bitters, and medicines which are popularly, as well as commercially, known and intended for sale to consumers as such under names or brands which shall not cause them, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be recognized as wines, or to be used as or for wines, or for compounding with wines or imitations thereof; all compounds in the nature of beverages, or intended, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for use as beverages, of preserved fruit-juices with substances not produced from fruits; all compounds of preserved fruit-juices with substances not produced from fruits, intended, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for use in the fermentation or preparation of liquors to be used as beverages; all articles in the nature of beverages known as wines, or imitations of wines, or liquors calculated or intended to be sold as or for wine, which are made in whole or in part from dried grapes or other dried fruits not grown in the United States, or from imported foreign fruit-juices which are admitted into the United States at a less rate of duty than still wines; also all such articles made in whole or in part of any dried grapes or other dried fruits, or from any preserved fruit-juices, except condensed must; the juice of grapes, apples, or other fruits fermented, prepared, perfected, preserved, or fortified as beverages with the use of materials intended, in whole or in part, as substitutes for fruit, or with the addition of aniline dyes or any coloring matter not produced from the fruit during a legitimate process of wine-making, or compounded with coloring fruit-juices of foreign production which are admitted at a rate of duty less than that imposed on foreign still wines, or containing salicylic acid or other anticeptic, or containing other adulterations or ingredients deleterious to the health of consumers, or with the use of any sugar except refined crystallized sugar for the sole purpose of perfecting the wine, or with the use of distilled spirits, or any liquors compounded with distilled spirits, to increase the alcoholic strength of wines for domestic consumption, for the purpose of enabling water to be used in enlarging the volume of such wines, or with the use of any distilled spirits in fortifying or mixing with wines for domestic consumption, except to preserve the wines, and except within the limitations and under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. —. That for the purposes of this act the word "beverage," as applied to wines, shall be understood to mean a liquor for drinking as distinguished from a medicine, such as wine of antimony, wine of colchicum, which may be administered in the treatment of disease: Provided, however, That where a physician prescribes a wine by name as medicine, such as vinum portensis (port wine), the wine bearing that name, defined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as pure, shall be furnished by the pharmacist. And any apothecary, druggist, pharmacist, or other person who shall sell on a physician's prescription, or who shall sell as a pure wine for medicinal use, any wine other than a pure wine, shall affix to each bottle or package containing the medicine so prepared or compounded, or upon each bottle or package of wine so sold or offered for sale, a stamp in the form prescribed in section — of this act, to be furnished and affixed under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe. Any person failing to use the stamp herein required shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $2,000, and imprisoned not less than ten days nor more than two years. Collectors of internal revenue shall have power to demand of manufacturers and dealers in wines claimed to be exempt from tax under this act such samples as may be needed in determining the truth of such claim; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require manufacturers to furnish with samples a sworn statement or formula of all the materials and processes used in the manufacture of such wines. Such statements or formulæ to be filed in the confidential archives of the Commissioner's office and preserved in secresy.

SEC. —. That compounders shall pay a special tax of $96. Every person who manufactures, compounds, or imports compounded liquors shall be deemed a compounder. Wholesale dealers in compounded liquors shall pay a special tax of $96. Every person who sells or offers for sale articles subject to tax under this title, in quantities of not less than five wine-gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a wholesale dealer in compounded liquors. But no compounder, as defined by this act, who has paid the special tax as such, and who sells only articles subject to tax under this act at the place of manufacture or importation, in the original packages, on which the tax-stamps are affixed, shall be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer in compounded liquors on account of such sales. Retail dealers in compounded liquors shall pay a special tax of $24. Every person who sells or offers for sale articles subject to tax under the provisions of this act, in less quantities than five wine-gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in compounded liquors. And the provisions of chapter 3, title 35, Revised Statutes of the United Statutes, concerning special taxes, as far as applicable, are hereby made applicable to the special taxes created by this act.

SEC. —. That every person who carries on the business of a compounder without having paid the special tax therefor as required by law shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000; and every person who carries on the business of a wholesale dealer in compounded liquors without having paid the special tax therefor as required by law shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $2,000; and every person who carries on the business of a retail dealer in compounded liquors without having paid the special tax therefor as required by law shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500 for each and every offense.

SEC. —. That every compounder shall file with the collector of internal revenue of the district in which his manufactory is located such notices, inventories, and bonds, shall keep such books and render such returns of materials and products, shall put up such signs and affix such number to his factory, and conduct his business under such surveillance of officers and agents as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require. But the bond required of such compounder shall be with sureties satisfactory to the collector of internal revenue, and in a penal sum of not less than $5,000; and the sum of said bond may be increased from time to time, and additional sureties required, at the discretion of the collector or under instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. That every wholesale dealer who offers for sale compounded liquors which are subject to tax under the provisions of this act shall be required to keep such books as will plainly show as to such liquors the date of each purchase and each sale, the quantity purchased or sold, as the case may be, and the name of the person from whom purchased or to whom sold; and such books shall at all times be open to inspection by any officer of the internal revenue.

SEC. —. That all packages, of whatever size or kind, held by any producer, wholesale dealer, or retailer, containing pure wines, whether foreign or domestic, intended to be offered for sale, whether they are denominated as wine, cider, or are known by any other name, shall be plainly stamped, branded, or labeled, in accordance with regulations which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with words indicating that they are pure according to the standard of the United States: Provided, however, That collectors of internal revenue, under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall exercise due vigilance in detecting fraudulent representations, and shall have the right to inquire whether such brands, labels, or marks correctly indicate the contents of the package to which they are affixed: And provided further, That such collectors shall be required to inform themselves as to methods of practice in producing any and all domestic liquors affected by this act and shall have the right to demand explicit information as to such methods, from any or all producers, when such wines or liquors are of domestic production, and as to the origin of such liquors, whether foreign or domestic, when in possession of dealers, and shall report on the same upon the demand of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. All packages bearing brands, labels, or marks indicating that their contents are exempt from taxation under this act, but which contents are subject to such taxation, shall be forfeited to the United States; and any person who shall brand, label, or mark, or cause to be branded, labeled, or marked, as free of tax under this act, any package, knowing the same to contain liquors liable to tax thereunder, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $2,000, and by imprisonment not less than ten days and not more than six months, for each offense; and any liquors containing alcohol, other than malt liquors, distilled spirits, cordials, bitters, and medicines, as defined herein, the packages of which are not stamped, branded, or labeled in accordance with the provisions of this section, shall be deemed to be taxable, and shall be taxed under the provisions of section — of this act.

SEC. —. That on all compounded liquors there shall be levied and collected a tax of 40 cents on each wine-gallon, and for each fraction thereof at the same rate per gallon, to be paid by the manufacturer, compounder, importer, or owner, or person having posession thereof, before removal from the place of manufacture or compounding, or in the case of imported articles taxable under this section, before removal from the custody of the proper custom-house officers. The tax levied by this section shall be represented by coupon-stamps when the taxable article is contained in packages holding five or more wine-gallons, and by strip-stamps suitable to be affixed to bottles when such article is contained in packages holding less than five wine-gallons; and the provisions of existing law governing the engraving, issue, use, accountability, cancellation, effacement, and destruction of stamps relating to distilled spirits, as far as applicable, are hereby made to apply to stamps provided for by this section: Provided, That any fraction of a pint shall be taxed as a pint: Provided further, That the taxable quantity in each package containing not less than five wine-gallons shall be determined by an internal-revenue gauger; and all existing laws governing the employment of gaugers in the gauging of distilled spirits, as far as applicable, are hereby made to apply to their employment under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That the tax so levied and collected shall not release the tax otherwise levied by law on any distilled spirits used in the preparation of such liquors: And provided further, That the tax herein provided for shall be in addition to any customs duty levied on such liquors when imported from foreign countries: And provided further, That under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury collectors of customs shall cause to be examined all importations of liquors taxable under this section, and all importations of liquors claimed to be pure wines, and shall promptly notify the collectors of internal revenue within whose districts such goods are landed from foreign countries, whenever any liquors liable to tax under this section are imported, and shall report quarterly to the Secretary of the Treasury full information as to the quantities of such taxable liquors and pure wines which may be imported. Collectors of customs shall also cause to be examined all importations claimed to be pure wines under this act, and shall exercise due vigilance to discover any false representations which may be made as to the character of such goods; and in case of the discovery of any facts which may cause it to be known that fraudulent representations are being or have been made, due notice of the same shall be given by collectors of customs to the proper collectors of internal revenue, and information of the same shall be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury. The reports of the proper customs officers appointed to make such examinations of imported liquors and wines shall be prima facie evidence of the true nature of such importations; and in the absence of other competent information such importations shall be treated as taxable or exempt from tax under this section in accordance with such reports, subject, however, to seizure and forfeiture if fraud has been practiced and discovered.

SEC. —. That all packages containing liquors taxable under section — of this act shall bear stamps indicating briefly the nature of their manufacture, and the name and place of the manufacturer, compounder, or importer, so affixed as to be plainly seen by any purchaser; and in case the holders of such liquors shall desire to empty any package so stamped, all new packages, of whatever size or character, shall have similar stamps likewise plainly affixed; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make all regulations necessary to provide for such change of stamps, as in the case of rectifiers, and for the proper identification of such goods to all holders or purchasers thereof. All packages containing such taxed liquors shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby authorized to prescribe the size of the letters, be legibly and prominently labeled, stamped, or branded also with the word "compounded."

SEC. —. That there shall be in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue an analytical chemist, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, whenever in his judgment the necessities of the service so require, employ chemists, to be paid such compensation as he may deem proper, not exceeding in the aggregate any appropriation made for that purpose; and the Commissioner is authorized to decide, for the purpose of taxation, what substances enter into the composition of liquors which may be submitted for his inspection in contested cases. The Commissioner may also decide whether any liquor containing alcohol and intended for human consumption contains adulterations or other ingredients deleterious to the public health; but in case of doubt or contest his decisions in this class of cases may be appealed from to a board hereby constituted for the purpose, and composed of the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the Commissioner of Agriculture.

SEC. —. That all packages of liquor subject to tax under this act that shall be found without stamps and marks as herein provided, and all liquors intended for use as beverages which contain adulterations or other ingredients known to be deleterious to the public health, shall be forfeited to the United States. Any person knowingly violating the provisions hereof, or who shall willfully remove or deface the stamps or marks on packages containing liquors taxed as provided in this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000, and by imprisonment for not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

SEC. —. That if any manufacturer of compounded liquors, any dealer therein, or any importer thereof shall knowingly or willfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000; and if the person so offending be the manufacturer of or a wholesale dealer in compounded liquors, all the compounded liquors owned by him or in which he has any interest as owner shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. —. That whenever any manufacturer of compounded liquor sells, or removes for sale or consumption, any compounded liquors upon which the tax is required to be paid by stamps, without the use of the proper stamps, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, within a period of not more than two years after such sale or removal, upon satisfactory proof, to estimate the amount of tax which has been omitted to be paid, and to make an assessment therefor and certify the same to the collector. The tax so assessed shall be in addition to the penalties imposed by law for such sale or removal.

SEC. —. That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed by this act may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction, one-half of such fine or penalty, when paid, to go to the informer.

SEC. —. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make all needful regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. —. That section 3328 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

SEC. —. That on and after the thirtieth day after the passage of this act the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power, for the purposes of this act, to define pure wines, which may be so stamped, branded, or labeled in accordance with the provisions of section — of this act; and on and after the sixtieth day after the passage of this act said section — shall be operative, so that the holders of pure wines may cause all packages of such wines in their possession to be plainly stamped, branded, or labeled with words indicating that they are pure according to the standard of the United States.

SEC. —. That on and after the ninetieth day after the passage of this act all of such portion thereof as is embraced in this title shall be in full force and effect; and all packages containing liquids in the nature of beverages known as wines, or known by names which, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, indicate that they are intended to be sold as or for wine, shall, on and after said ninetieth day, be deemed to be taxable and shall be taxed as compounded liquors under section — of this act, unless stamped, branded, or labeled as provided in section — of this act; and for the purpose of securing the affixing of the stamps, marks, and brands required by sections — and — of this act, compounded liquors shall be regarded as having been manufactured and sold, or removed from the place of manufacture for consumption or use, on or after said ninetieth day; and such stock on hand on such ninetieth day may be stamped, marked, and branded under special regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may authorize the holder of such packages to mark and brand the same and to affix thereto the proper tax-paid stamps.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I learn from the Appropriations Committee that if the bill now under consideration shall be disposed of to-day the Senate can complete its work regarding the appropriation bills so that Congress may finally adjourn next week. I hope to get a vote on this measure to-day, if possible, not of course cutting off any proper debate if anybody desires to debate it. It is very evident that we can not dispose on this bill of amendments of the importance of those now offered, and therefore I move to lay this amendment on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that motion will not be made. It cuts off debate.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator offering it desires to speak, of course I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. That motion cuts off debate entirely.

Mr. MILLER. Only on this amendment. If the Senator from South Carolina desires to debate the amendment, of course I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. It is quite likely I shall desire to debate it before the bill is disposed of. I am not prepared to debate it now. There are other gentlemen who wish to take the floor.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the motion until later on if any Senator desires to speak on the amendment.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the motion is not debatable. I ask the Senator from New York to withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire whether the amendment that I proposed on Saturday to the pending bill is the pending amendment, to strike out all after section 2 and insert as a third section what is printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not remember that that amendment was offered. If it was, it properly should be the pending amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill. In section 3, line 1, I move to strike out all after the word "that" and insert——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not in order now.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, in rising to address the Senate on this question I could not hope to add anything of value to what has been so ably said by the Senators from Texas and by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] this morning, but the bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture appeals so strongly to what is seemingly the interest of large numbers of very worthy people whose well-being and prosperity I am anxious in every proper way to promote, that I am constrained to state very briefly the reasons which prevent my voting to make this bill a law.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that inasmuch as the legislative powers conferred by the Constitution on Congress are specific and enumerated and limited in their scope, many things which may be desirable of accomplishment are outside of the domain of Federal legislation, and remain as the proper subjects of the ungranted powers of legislation of the States. Among these powers ungranted to the General Government are unquestionably what have come to be known as the police powers, remaining in and rightfully exercised by the several States. These have been well defined as to their character and scope in the citations from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations and the judicial opinions read by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] on Saturday, and I will take the liberty of referring to them again.

Judge Cooley, on page 572 of his work, says:

> The police of a State, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its system of internal regulation, by which it is sought not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the State, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizen with citizen those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with like enjoyment of rights by others.

Says another eminent judge:

> This police power of the State extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State. According to the maxim, Sic utere two ut alienum non laedas, which being of universal application, it must, of course, be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which every one may so use his own as not to injure others.

And again:

> By this general police power of the State persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State; of the perfect right in the Legislature to do which no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be made, so far as natural persons are concerned.
> In the American constitutional system, the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government. Neither can the National Government through any of its departments or officers assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States, so long as they do not invade the sphere of national sovereignty and obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution had confided to the nation.

Now, what is the object and purport of this bill? For by the character of that object we must test our power to make the bill a law. It is not hard to find. It is not disputed. The advocates and opponents of the bill alike state that it is to regulate, if not to destroy, an industry already established in this country within the jurisdiction of the States, and to prevent one manufactured product from competing with another, and incidentally to restrain the use of what is asserted to be an unwholesome food. The very title of the bill sufficiently indicates this. It is, "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine."

And the Senator from New York, with great frankness, states that—

> Doubtless this is a new species of legislation, or largely so, in this country, and under our system; that the exigencies of the case seem so great that this body can not afford to ignore them.

And further on he says:

> I resort to no subterfuges in this case, Mr. President. My object in bringing forward this bill and supporting it is not to secure a large increase to the revenue of our Government, but I have sought to invoke the taxing power of the Government in order that under it the Government might take absolute control of this manufacture, might properly regulate it, and so regulate and control it that it should be carried on in a legitimate way and that the product should be sold to the consumer in all cases for what it is; and it is for that purpose that the friends of this measure have invoked the taxing power of the Government.

The object, then, of the friends of the bill is, by the confession of the author of it and the principal supporter and promoter of it on this floor, not to raise revenue for any public or other purpose, but to control the manufacture of an article within the jurisdiction of the States, to regulate if not to entirely suppress it.

It may be pertinent right here and in opposition to the views of the Senator from New York to cite the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in a case often referred to, the case of the United States vs. De Witt, upon what are the powers of Congress in regard to the control of an industry within the jurisdiction of the States, and I read from 9 Wallace, page 41, the case of the United States vs. De Witt:

> The twenty-ninth section of the internal-revenue act of March 2, 1867 (14 Statutes at Large, 484), which makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or to sell or offer such mixture for sale, or to sell or offer for sale oil made of petroleum for illuminating purposes inflammable at less temperature or fire-test than 110 degrees Fahrenheit, is in fact a police regulation relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States.

Chief-Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

> As a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States, it can only have effect where the legislative authority of Congress excludes territorially all State legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia. Within State limits it can have no constitutional operation. This has been so frequently declared by this court, results so obviously from the terms of the Constitution, and has been so fully explained and supported on former occasions, that we think it unnecessary to enter again upon the discussion.

The question then is, have we the power to legislate for the purpose set forth by the Senator from New York in the following propositions? I read from the record of the Senator's speech where he says:

> I base my support of this bill chiefly upon the four following reasons:
> First. It is necessary in order to protect the people from fraud and imposition in having a counterfeit article sold to them for the genuine.
> Second. It is necessary to protect the public health, for if it be admitted that oleo when made according to the process known as the Mége process is wholesome, yet I hold that the best of it, made as it is made to-day, is not as wholesome as butter and that it may be the means of communicating disease to the human system.
> Third. It is necessary to protect the chief farming interest of the country, which is the dairy, from unjust and fraudulent competition and consequent loss, if not absolute ruin.
> Fourth. This legislation is necessary, because the States have not been able thus far to either suppress or properly control the great evil of which I have spoken, and as sufficient remedy can be found nowhere, in my judgment, save under the Federal Government.

Now, if we have the power to legislate for the purposes set forth in these four propositions I shall be glad to co-operate in achieving some of them; but if we have not the power, then no temptation presented by the desire to benefit a worthy industry or to suppress an unworthy one should for a moment swerve us from our manifest duty.

With this admission of the objects and purposes of this bill, the admitted fact that the Treasury of the United States is overflowing with money taken by taxation from the pockets of the people, and that an increase of revenue would be an increase only of embarrassment to the finances of the Government, the advocates of this bill still say that they can rightfully use the taxing power of the Government to accomplish these objects and purposes. They do not deny that Congress has no power to legislate directly on these subjects, or that they belong to the police powers of the States.

So the question is, can a legislative power be used to accomplish by indirection an object clearly beyond the scope of any express or implied power granted to Congress? The power to lay and collect taxes in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is the first of the enumerated powers granted to Congress. Wide and plenary as this grant of power is, it is still limited in its exercise to the purpose declared by the Constitution, to wit, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" and this power and the purpose for which it was granted can not be divorced.

It is true that no court could look behind the law which laid the tax to question the motive that actuated Congress in its passage, and therefore no court could declare such a law as is proposed by this bill to be unconstitutional. But are not constitutional restraints as binding on Congress as upon courts? How can Senators satisfy their minds and conscience to vote for a bill to lay and collect taxes for any other purpose than that which the Constitution declares shall be the only purpose for which Congress shall lay and collect taxes, to wit, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States?

Cooley in the Principles of Constitutional Law, on page 57, says:

> Constitutionally a tax can have no other basis than the raising of a revenue for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful. A tax on imports, therefore, the purpose of which is not to raise a revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular import for the benefit of some home manufacture, may well be questioned as being merely colorable, and therefore not warranted by constitutional principles.

Surely we are trifling with our obligations when we say that the avowed and real object of this bill is not to lay a tax in order to pay the debts or defray the expense incurred in providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, because the taxes already laid are more than sufficient for that purpose; but under color of laying a tax we intend to suppress one industry for the benefit of another, and, if you please, to restrain the manufacture of a noxious food product, or to protect the people from fraud and imposition, or to protect the public health.

We know that the power to do any of these things has not been granted to Congress, and that it is an invasion of the police power reserved to the States; but we will accomplish them all the same by the use of the taxing power for a purpose different from that for which it is declared by the Constitution to have been granted.

This, of course, is a misuse and an abuse of a constitutional power, a violation of constitutional obligations resting on us as Senators; but the bill, on its face, is a bill to tax and as the title does not declare its true object no court can set it aside. This, it seems to me, is the position to which we bring ourselves by the argument made by the advocates of this bill.

It would be in vain to call this a government of limited powers if the powers granted for one purpose could be perverted to another purpose not contemplated in the Constitution. Something else is needed besides the specification and enumeration of the powers of legislation, and the definition of their scope and purpose to insure the maintenance of the constitutional scheme of government devised by our fathers, and that was and is an absolute fidelity to the great trusts of power conferred by the Constitution on the part of those who administer and exercise them.

It is a doctrine full of peril to our liberties, that we may seize upon any weapon we please out of the great armory of Federal powers, and wield it for a purpose for which it was never intended.

I lay down, then, the proposition as one of binding force, at least to regulate my own action, that a power of legislation granted in the Constitution for a purpose there declared can not be rightfully exercised for any other purpose.

The Senator from New York, with great candor, says this is a new species of legislation for Congress. I trust it may never become accustomed or old. Just now the agitation is in behalf of the dairy interest. In the constantly changing moods to which the desire for class legislation is subject, other and different demands will with increasing frequency, if this bill becomes a law, be made upon Congress to use the taxing power to protect first one and then another interest. Those who for the time being can by clamor and importunate appeal gain the attention of Congress will not be slow to invent plausible reasons why the interests they represent should receive the protection of this power to lay and collect taxes, and a door will be flung wide open by which we can at pleasure enter and usurp all those powers of internal regulation which were so carefully and by express words reserved by the framers of the Constitution to the States and to the people.

It is said that this article called oleomargarine is a fraudulent one, inasmuch as it is often sold for what it is not, to wit, dairy butter. It is most desirable, I admit, that this should not be; and many of the States have already passed laws to prevent it, and they may have to enact and doubtless will enact still more stringent ones to accomplish the object. I shall with pleasure support the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, to prevent the sale of oleomargarine in the Territories and in the District of Columbia except under its own name. I shall be glad to go further and provide for the inspection of all oleomargarine to be exported out of the country, so that it shall be branded with its proper name, because I believe that it is competent for Congress to do that under the power to regulate foreign commerce. Just as far as my convictions of duty will permit, I will go in devising legislation to prevent the fraudulent sale of this article for what it is not; but I can not gain my own consent as a legislator to attempt to prevent one fraud by committing another.

So far, then, as the object of this bill is to compel the sale of oleomargarine under its true name I sympathize with it, but say that it is clearly a matter for the police power of the States alone and for Congress in respect to the District of Columbia and the Territories. Its wholesomeness or unwholesomeness is a question not for Congress, except in the District and the Territories, but for the States. The regulation, suppression, or restraint of the manufacture of a deleterious substance within their own limits belongs to the States exclusively.

But what are we to say as to the object of this proposed legislation as avowed in the third of the principal reasons stated by the Senator from New York upon which he based his support of the bill? That object is to protect the dairy interest of the country from competition with an artificial butter.

Mr. President, it is the old cry of protection the world over, protection of one producing class at the expense of all others and of the great body of consumers. Here is a cheap food product not shown by the evidence produced by those most interested in suppressing it to be unwholesome, but only at the most not quite so good or digestible as first-class butter, which it is proposed to tax, not for the purpose of raising a revenue, but for the purpose of enhancing its price to consumers for the benefit of the producers of another food product. This is paternalism and communism combined in their most insidious forms. What right has the Government to go into partnership with people who are engaged in one industry to the detriment of those engaged in another? Suppose one State is peculiarly a cattle-raising State, in which the oleomargarine manufacture, honestly conducted, we will suppose is the dominant and principal industry, what would be thought of a proposition to tax all dairy butter, the manufacturing of which happened to be the dominant and principal industry in another State, for the benefit of the former? Could the vice of protection be more clearly portrayed, or the prostitution of the powers of government be more clearly exposed? What sort of conception of government is that which allows the hand of governmental power to go down into my pocket to take out the dollar there, not for the purpose of putting it in the Treasury of the nation, but to transfer it to the pocket of my neighbor?

Against this monstrous claim of power I have been protesting during all my political life. No class of our people have so suffered from the exercise of this power as the farmers of our country. Compelled to sell in an open market and to buy in a protected one, they have borne upon their bowed backs for many years the burden of a protective tariff.

I have no public ambition greater than that I may be permitted in some humble way to aid in removing some portion at least of that burden. I should be ashamed to go home to my farmer constituents and say that all that I had urged before them these many years as to the iniquity of governmental protection of one industry at the expense of all others was heresy and hypocrisy, that the doctrine that they and I had all along been denouncing as false in theory and ruinous in practice was after all the orthodox one, and that we now propose to turn around and apply it for our own benefit, to use the power of internal taxation as the tariff taxation has been used, though it was true that the power might some day be wrested from our hands and turned against us and our interests hereafter. Should I be so false to their interests and my own convictions, I know that their honesty and intelligence would repudiate with scorn such a proposal.

It may be that it is the cue now of the protection-by-taxation party to seek favor with a class who have heretofore been the victims of their policy, but they ought never, nay, they can never deceive those who are intelligent enough to perceive a principle and honest enough to maintain it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the only power that Congress has to pass a law such as is proposed by this bill is derived from that clause of the Constitution which delegates to Congress the power to levy taxes, imposts, and excises. This bill is upon its face and in its terms a tax bill, and can not be constitutionally rested upon any other ground. Yet, it is not and will not be pretended by any one of its advocates that there is at this time the slightest necessity for an increase of revenue or the slightest excuse for increasing taxation. Upon the contrary, they admit that revenue is not the object or purpose and that revenue will not result from its passage.

They admit that the object is to prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine throughout the country. That being the object, it is an undisguised and admitted prostitution of the taxing power to a purpose wholly different from the one for which that power was delegated to Congress.

I am safe in asserting that there is not a Senator upon this floor who will assert the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit by direct legislative declaration the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in the States. It being admitted, as it must be admitted, that this can not be constitutionally done directly, who will undertake to justify, either in morals or in law, the attempt to accomplish it by indirection?

The bill in its present form is a false pretense. It professes to seek revenue, when in fact revenue is neither desired nor expected as a result; and its passage will be a much more far-reaching, dangerous, and serious fraud upon the Constitution than all the frauds that have been, or ever will be, practiced upon the people by falsely representing oleomargarine to be butter. I have never voted and will never vote to exercise the taxing power for any purpose other than that of raising such revenues as are actually necessary to the Government.

To use that power for the purpose of enriching one class of citizens at the expense of another—for the purpose of transferring a portion of the earnings of one class to increase the profits of another—is a usurpation of power, a great wrong, not to say a crime.

With a large surplus in the Treasury for which the Government has no present need, and which ought never to have been exacted from the people, but allowed to remain in the channels of commerce, and with an existing revenue system which will from year to year increase that surplus, withdrawing more and more from the earnings of the people and the business and trade of the country to be locked up in the vaults of the Treasury and lay there idle and useless, why should new objects of taxation or an increase of taxation in any form be thought of?

But, Mr. President, as I said before, it is not pretended that revenue is the object of this bill. It is too plain to admit of argument or doubt that the purpose is to prostitute the revenue power to the accomplishment of an object that Congress has not the semblance of power to accomplish in any other way; or, in other words, has no legitimate constitutional power to accomplish in this or in any way.

This legislation is demanded by the dairymen of the country because they say that oleomargarine is a cheap substitute for dairy butter, and therefore they demand that its manufacture and sale be prevented by a prohibitory tax.

If oleomargarine is a pure, healthful, and nutritious food, as I understand it to be, its manufacture is as legitimate and as laudable as the making of butter, and the more cheaply it can be furnished the consumer the better.

Why should the Government exert its power, or in any manner interfere with the competition which exists between two lawful and legitimate home industries?

The dairy interest is an important one, I grant, and I will go as far as any other Senator to secure to it absolute fair play; but I will not consent to tax out of existence another industry to free it from competition.

The amendment that I have proposed goes as far as Congress can constitutionally go in respect to this question.. It provides that it shall be unlawful to sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or in any of the Territories of the United States oleomargarine unless the purchaser is informed of its true character. It forbids all false pretenses. It forbids its assuming the name of butter to compete with butter, but compels it to sail under its own flag and in its own name.

Congress, having legislative jurisdiction over the District of Columbia and the Territories, may, with propriety and justice, go this far, and I hope it will, and then I shall be glad to see every State that has not already done so pass a similar act.

This will leave butter to the full enjoyment of all the prestige and good-will that attaches to its name and character, and gives oleomargarine an open field in which to make a name and a market for itself.

What right has the Government to say to the producer of either of these food products, you shall not compete with the other? What right has it to say to the citizen we will put it out of your power to consume this cheap food however much you may need and desire it? If this principle is to be adopted, why not tax corn-meal out of existence because it is a cheaper food and competes with flour?

Why not tax pork out of existence because it competes with beef?

Why not adopt a sumptuary code in the interest of certain classes, and prescribe to the people specifically what they may and what they shall not eat or drink?

For these reasons, sir, I shall vote in favor of the amendment striking out all after the first and second sections (the first of which defines butter and the second defines oleomargarine), and to insert as the third section the amendment which I have already offered, that being as far as I think legislation, either Federal or State, has any right to go or ought to go in the premises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] moved to lay the amendment on the table, as the Chair understands?

Mr. MILLER. I withdrew that. I would just as soon take a direct vote on the amendment as to take it upon laying on the table. If the Senator offering the amendment prefers to have the vote taken that way let the vote be taken directly on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after section 2 of the bill and to insert:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful to sell or offer for sale within the limits of the District of Columbia or any of the Territories of the United States oleomargarine as defined in section 2 of this act, unless the package containing the same be clearly and distinctly marked or branded with the word "oleomargarine," and in addition the purchaser informed of the true character of the article so offered for sale. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court, and one-half of the fines so imposed shall go to the informer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee which has been read.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] who is absent.

Mr. MILLER. I think I know the sentiments of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] upon this question, and I am very sure that he would not vote for the amendment. I think the Senator from Kentucky is at entire liberty to vote on this question if he desires to do so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will simply say that I have taken every opportunity that I could, even telegraphing to the absent Senator, to know. I have had no answer from him, and I have had no assurance from the other side of the Chamber. If the Senator from New York is satisfied, and will assume the responsibility, I shall vote.

Mr. MILLER. I will assume the responsibility so far as this amendment is concerned. I am very sure as to that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Upon the assurance given by the Senator from New York I shall vote. I vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). On this question and on all questions pertaining to the bill I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote for the amendment and against the bill on the question of its passage.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness, and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. My colleague would vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My colleague [Mr. MORRILL] is absent on account of ill health. He is paired generally with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If my colleague were present, I have no doubt he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 32; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GEORGE. Let it be read.

Mr. MILLER. It has been read.

Mr. GEORGE. It is a very long amendment. I hope the vote will not be taken without Senators having an opportunity of knowing what is in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been read.

Mr. GEORGE. Can we not have it read or explained so that we may understand it?

Mr. MILLER. It was read a short time ago. It would take ten or fifteen minutes to read it.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator give us the substance of what it is?

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from South Carolina will explain it.

Mr. BUTLER. It is substantially the bill which is before the Committee on Finance in regard to spurious compounds, imitations of wines, impure wines, and which has been presented in another branch of Congress upon the same subject, proposing a tax upon beverages adulterated with compounds of various kinds. It is in addition to the present bill, and puts the whole question under the supervision and jurisdiction of the Internal Revenue Bureau, and makes provisions and regulations for the enforcement of the act.

I shall vote for the amendment of course, as I think if the provision of the bill is to become a law it might be extended in its scope so as to protect some other industries in this country besides mere butter, but I give notice that if my amendment shall pass I shall vote against the bill. I am opposed to the spirit of the bill as unconstitutional and unwise.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not know exactly what the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is. It can not be much worse than the original proposition. I suppose it is in the same general line.

We have had a good deal of discussion before the Committee on Finance on sumptuary laws, and this sounds like one we had before us. I believe, however, that the committee has not so far thought it consistent with its duty to urge the passage of any of them. I suppose it is bet cause it has not done so that it was thought best now to allow the oleomargarine bill to go before that committee. But after the vote cast by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and other gentlemen on that committee, I think they have lost faith in themselves as to their capacity to deal with subjects relating to taxation, therefore they have determined to have a general scramble in the Senate, and we might just as well vote for one thing as another, the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina along with the others.

Questions of this sort have been up time and again. None of them have so far become laws. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] has been the champion of most of them. Three years ago when we had the long discussion on the tariff bill of March, 1883, the Senator from New York undertook to tax or legislate white-wine vinegar factories out of existence in order to protect the products of the orchards of New York and elsewhere. He piled petitions mountain-high before the committee and made speeches before the Senate urging the measure in order to protect apples with as much zeal and earnestness, and with as much plausibility, and upon as strong grounds as he is now urging the passage of the pending bill to protect those who deal in butter.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator, I think, is scarcely correct in his statement. The vinegar bill to which he refers was not a tax on vinegar, but it simply provided that distilled spirits or whisky used in the manufacture of vinegar should be taxed the same as any other distilled spirits used in any other of the arts. The argument that I made at that time was so convincing to the Senate that even the Senator from Kentucky voted for it, and it was carried through by the assistance of his vote, and then after a very few days by some very curious operation, I scarcely then know how it was done, the vote was reconsidered, when I think the Senator from Kentucky voted the other way.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from New York came then, as he does now, with a great clamor that frauds were being committed and that the cider men were surreptitiously using alcohol without paying any tax; he found a few cases in Brooklyn where frauds were committed, and for the time he induced a good many of us to vote with him in order to stop those frauds. We all desired to prevent the makers of vinegar from defrauding the Government. A motion was made to reconsider the vote the next day. It was made I believe by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. The charge was investigated. It was found that only the ordinary frauds that occur in any sort of business at isolated points were committed; the vote was reconsidered, and the proposition was rejected after full debate. I have the RECORD before me. I will read a few extracts so that there will be no mistake about the facts. Let me state first, on page 2478, volume 14, part 3, the proposed amendment was rejected by a vote of 33 to 16. The Senator from New York at once introduced a bill. I will read from the RECORD so that there will be no mistake about what he said:

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. 2477) to repeat an act relating to vinegar factories established and operated prior to March 1, 1879, approved June 14, 1879; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask to have the bill referred to the Committee on Finance, and I desire to call the attention of that committee to it. We have had several dispatches read here this morning stating that all the vinegar manufacturers are on their way to Washington, and I desire to call the attention of the Finance Committee to any hearing that may be given them. Of course the million farmers will not get here in time to be heard, but nevertheless we shall try to represent them.

Just before that vote was taken the distinguished gentleman, who has championed, as I said, all that class of measures, said:

The results are as I have stated, that it has destroyed and confiscated property to the value of millions of dollars in the great fruit-growing States, and it has destroyed the honest business of manufacturing cider vinegar. In the State of New York there are over 2,500 cider-vinegar manufacturers; they are men of moderate means located all over the State a few miles apart. There are many farmers who, having accumulated a little capital, erect large buildings for the storage of cider vinegar, and they buy up the apple crop from their neighbors about, paying from 10 to 25 cents a bushel for the apples.

Again, he says:

My own neighbors, I know, have not thought their apple crop to be of sufficient value to gather the portion of it suitable for vinegar. They have given the apples away to anybody who would come and carry them off.

But I do protest that to select out just one industry, represented by only ninety men in this country, and to give them a monopoly of this thing and put them in a position where they can destroy the fruit-growing interest of the United States is certainly not giving equal and exact justice to all our people before the law.

That was the tone of his whole argument. The Senator from Iowa, who seems now to be an advocate of the dairymen, was a zealous opponent of the proposition of the Senator from New York when the vinegar factories were attacked; he maintained, and the Senate was satisfied, that the white-wine vinegar made in those factories was made by as innocent a process and was as healthy a product as cider made from apples; that there was 2 per cent. alcohol in white-wine vinegar was admitted, and there was at least that much in cider vinegar was conceded, the one being produced from the fermentation of corn and the other from apples; alcohol was shown to be the ingredient which preserved them both. Congress saw that it was a contest on the part of the apple producers to stop the manufacture of it, or tax it so as to enable them to sell their cider at a higher price. The argument made then by the cider-vinegar men was the same as is made now in regard to butter; when forced to tell the grievances, it was that their product was excluded by a cheaper article. The effort to force consumers to pay a higher price was made as earnestly then as it is now.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator permit me just a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly; as long as you like. I happen to have that record before me.

Mr. MILLER. I am very glad to have the Senator bring out the fact that I have been consistent in advocacy of the interest of the farmers of this country; but he will certainly remember that contest and the discussion well enough to remember that the chief claim for that legislation was based upon the ground that the whisky-vinegar manufacturers succeeded in distilling spirits and putting them upon the market without paying the tax, thereby gaining a great profit out of their fraudulent transactions, and were making a great profit out of the distilled spirits thus put upon the market without paying the tax, and they were able of course to sell their vinegar for much less than the real cost if they had paid the tax on it the same as on whisky. That was the basis of the argument.

Mr. BECK. That was the first pretext, and it was proven abundantly that with the exception of a few cases in Brooklyn nothing of the sort was perpetrated. The Senator from Iowa showed that in his State, and the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Cameron, in his, and in many parts of the country it was shown abundantly that there was no legitimate ground for complaint. At last it settled down to the proposition I have stated, which was merely to prevent one set of manufacturers from underselling another under the pretense that the production was dishonest and the product unwholesome. The real trouble was that the white-wine vinegar could be made for from 4 to 6 cents a gallon, and that the cider vinegar could not be made profitably for less than 10 or 12 cents a gallon, and that the cheapness of the article, although it was admitted to be of superior quality, and that pickles and the thousand other things that are put up in vinegar could be carried across the tropics to South America in white-wine vinegar, and could not be carried because of the fermentation that continued to go on, in cider vinegar, the principle objection was that they were underselling their apple-vinegar competitors, and the argument made and the petitions filed all urged that view. The Legislature of New Jersey sent resolutions here, the farmers of New York and Pennsylvania were excited; petition after petition came, a number of which I hold in my hand, all based upon the idea that the cheapness of the article was destroying the value of apples and the apple trees in the orchards, and that they could not compete, and therefore they must be protected against a bogus product. As I said, many gentlemen who first voted for the measure when they understood what it was refused to sustain it and reconsidered the action first taken in regard to it when they found that the charges of fraud were only made to secure the destruction of fair competition. I am not going to read the whole record of the debate, but some of the gentlemen who are so zealous for this measure took the true position then.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said:

Let me see what the Senator is trying to get at. I agree with him that cider vinegar is much the best. I do not believe that the other is nearly as good. I do not know for what it can be manufactured. I do not know what sort of a business it is that results in its being sold for 4, 5, or 6 cents a gallon. But supposing that the people of the Western States get a good table vinegar manufactured here that they are satisfied with at 4, 5, or 6 cents a gallon, does the Senator believe that we ought to insist, by imposing a heavy duty, upon their buying his vinegar and my vinegar, the vinegar of New York and of New England, simply because we believe it is a better vinegar and can be made cheaper? Would the Senator interfere with this market in the West and with this price of a product that they are satisfied with? If he would, he would do different from what I would. This is not a question of the production of foreign labor. I do not want anything upon this bill that obliges the people of the West, if they prefer to use a poor vinegar at 4 or 5 cents, to take our better vinegar. I do not believe it is a part and parcel of a tariff bill.

That statement pretty much exhausts the argument in this case. If the object is to guard against fraud or imposition, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] which has just been voted down gave every man a chance to know what he is buying. That is all Congress ought to be asked to do. If there are men who prefer to buy and eat oleomargarine or butterine, knowing what it is, why should they not do so? We can have it branded, as far as the United States has authority to do so, as we have in the District of Columbia and the Territories, that may be supplemented by State authority in the several States, and will be, if needed, by the several State Legislatures. Why should men be obliged to pay to the butter dealers of New York or the butter dealers of Kentucky or the butter dealers of any other State twice as much as they can get another article for that they prefer?

I repeat, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] exhausted the argument in the statement I have read, yet I assume that he too will now vote for this bill thinking it may have some effect on the farmers' votes in some election. Aspiring Senators are all anxious to push this bill through right or wrong to show what friends they are to the farmer.

Kentucky makes butter, and has perhaps as good cattle and as good grass as any other State, but I do not believe that any of the people of my State or any dairyman living in it wants to be protected against anybody else in this country who manufactures anything that anybody wants. This proposition is protection run mad. I do not know, as was said the other day, why we should not as well protect the breed of horses by prohibiting the raising of mules, why we should not protect the coal-miners against the natural gas, as was said by the Senator from Texas the other day, or the gas-men against the light of the sun. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was equally pronounced when that debate was going on. He said:

Mr. HAWLEY. I am one who is going to change his vote; because we have nothing to do with rival processes of manufacture or cutting each other out of the market, and all that sort of thing. If the revenue laws are evaded by the secret selling of alcohol developed in these establishments, the existing laws give the Commissioner of Internal Revenue full power to follow and prosecute these men.

That is what is proposed now. This case was then well stated by the Senator from Connecticut. If any law is needed to enable men to know what they are buying or restrictions are needed to prevent fraud or to prevent the imposition upon the people of an article as being a thing that it is not, to the extent of the power of Congress I propose to give all the people that security; but when it comes to the question, and that is the only one really before us, disguise it as you may, I repeat, as the Senator from Connecticut then said:

We have nothing to do with rival processes of manufacture or cutting each other out of the market, and all that sort of thing.

Nobody denies that the bill is a tax bill, and on its face it is a constitutional bill, because it professes to do what Congress has a right to do; but when gentlemen rise in their places and avow that they do not mean to do what the bill proposes, then their action and vote come within the denunciation so well stated in the argument made in the report which I had read the other day, written, as I said, by one of the ablest men in the country, Hon. JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER, of Virginia. No man has answered that argument, and, as I can not improve it, I will adopt it and read part of it again to see if any Senator will attempt to answer it. He says:

Second. It remains to inquire whether oleomargarine or any other product may be subjected to an internal-revenue tax.

If the power to lay taxes (Const. U. S., Art. I, secs. 8 and 9) involves the power in Congress to select any article for excise or other tax, as seems to be now settled by the practice of the Government (and no doubt properly so settled), then the right to tax oleomargarine is undoubted.

But your committee are constrained to add that this is a revenue power. The right "to lay" is conjoined with that "to collect taxes," and the right to lay and collect is conjoined with the purpose "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare." The power is conferred in order to the duty imposed on Congress. It is a trust power, and becomes a right only when used for the purpose in view. The tax is the means to the end, and is only legitimate and rightful when needful for the end.

It is distinctly avowed by the advocates of this bill that they do not propose or desire to raise revenue by the taxation imposed in this measure for public purposes. It is almost admitted to be an indirect method of striking down a business which is obnoxious mainly because it is cheapening products. They do not ask to prohibit its manufacture. As I said the other day, when the Senator from Texas was speaking, they admit upon the face of the bill that the product is one which can be legitimately made, one which can be properly used. There is no sanitary reason against it. They admit that if a tax of 5 cents a pound is paid to the Government it is wholesome. They will hardly venture to say that it is not wholesome if it is made freely and cheaply. The report I read from continues—I hope Senators will listen and answer it if they can:

To use the tax when needless for revenue, merely to strike down a product or an industry, is to abuse a constitutional trust; and while the power may be conferred, the right to use it in such case can not be asserted. All power under our system is trust power; to use it for the trust makes it a rightful power; to use it diverso intuitu is wrongful perversion and abuse of power, and is contrary to the Constitution. In other words, as Congress can not forbid the production of an article in a State by direct legislation, it can not use a power conferred for another purpose to destroy and prevent such production. To do by indirect means what it could not do by direct legislation would be an unworthy evasion of constitutional limitations, which can not be sanctioned by an enlightened construction of the Constitution.

It is true that in such cases the judicial power may not be able to declare such taxation void, because the judge dare not look into the intents of the legislator's breast; but the legislator who so abuses his trust and wrongfully misuses power can not avoid responsibility to his own conscience, bound as it is to support the Constitution; for by personal introspection he will find his motive not to be a tax for revenue to the Government, but a tax as a means of destruction to the product subjected to it; that is, tax used as an instrument of destruction and not as a means of revenue.

There is not a Senator who proposes to vote for that bill who does not know that every word there uttered is true, and that his motive is what Mr. TUCKER says in that report is subversive of all good legislation and contrary to all true constitutional principles.

I had intended to read more from the debate in 1883 on the vinegar bill, but I believe I shall not do so. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] took part in it, and the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Cameron. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in his incisive way said among other things:

Mr. President, if I understand the effect of this amendment it will prevent the manufacture of what is known as white-wine vinegar, an article of almost universal consumption in the West, which is sold now at an average of 4 or 5 cents a gallon, and compel all those who use vinegar west of the Alleghany Mountains to purchase an article of cider vinegar manufactured in New England or New York or Pennsylvania that will cost at least double that price to every retail consumer. In addition to that, it will result in the practical destruction of a great many hundreds of thousands of dollars that are now invested in the legitimate enterprise of the manufacture of white-wine vinegar.

I made a short speech, in which I admitted that when the question was first presented by the Senator from New York and he claimed the existence of such extensive frauds I thought the business had better be stopped, but upon looking into it, when I found that fraud was only a pretext and that the whole object then, as it is now, was to strike down and cut off a cheap, wholesome, competing product in order to force men to pay more for another product which they do not want, and that was not, in many instances, as good for their purposes, I reversed my vote. I could not sustain a measure upon the ground that if the people of the whole country were not compelled to pay higher prices for vinegar the orchards of New York and New Jersey and Pennsylvania would not be valuable, and the apples that they used to make into cider could not be sold to advantage. Nor will I now vote to make the people buy anybody's butter at a high price if they do not want it, nor will I destroy under pretense of taxation a cheap substitute which they like and want in order to force them to pay what any butter dealer demands. There is neither justice nor decency in such legislation, in my opinion.

The petitions that are now said to be piled up mountain-high from the dairymen are no higher than the petitions that I have been piling up and every other Senator has been piling up from men who never heard of the bills whose passage they asked for. They are all in the same forms; I suppose I shall present half a dozen more to-morrow from people claiming to come from Kentucky. They ask for the passage of the following bills:

1. House bill No. 7887, repealing timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land acts;
2. House bill No. 7021, for adjustment of railroad and other land grants;
3. Bills forfeiting all railroad land grants the conditions of which have not been strictly complied with;
4. House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma;
5. Senate bill opening a portion of the great Sioux reservation to settlement;
6. Bill prohibiting aliens from holding land in the United States;
7. Bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays, and prohibiting bribery;
8. Bill directing disbursements of at least $200,000,000 Treasury surplus, and substituting Treasury notes for bank notes retired.

These are wholesale petitions coming by the hundreds to all of us, manufactured, as nine-tenths of the petitions that come here are manufactured. I have had petitions sent to me to vote for this bill and I have had letters sent to me from people to whom they have been written begging them to sign and forward these petitions to Senators and Representatives. Here is one [exhibiting] from one Joseph H. Reall, the president of the American Agricultural and Dairy Association, 169 Chambers street, New York. That is rather a remarkable place for the president of an agricultural and dairy association to live. There is not much of a farm around Chambers street, as I understand. It reads as follows:

AMERICAN AGRICULTURAL AND DAIRY ASSOCIATION,
169 Chambers Street, New York, June 8, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: We have succeeded in passing our bill through the House of Representatives after a most desperate struggle. We had 177 votes for us and 101 against us, but the enemy fought our measure for ten days and exhausted every means to defeat it. We have now to work upon the Senate, and I ask your best aid toward success with that body. Will you please write your Senators, and have all the leading men you can do the same, urging the adoption of the House bill regulating the sale of bogus butter and taxing it 10 cents per pound? The House reduced the tax to 5 cents, but we hope the Senate will restore it. This measure is of the utmost importance to the dairy industry of the United States.

Our chief opponents in the House were the Southern members, and we fear that the Senators from that section will oppose us. Will you, therefore, please communicate at once with your sister societies in the South, and urge them to use their strongest influence with their Senators in behalf of our bill. Address me No. 22 Grant Place, Washington, D. C.

Yours, very truly,

JOS. H. REALL, President.

P. S.—Please have resolutions adopted by your organization in favor of the bill and send me.

At an earlier date I find this distinguished president of the American Agricultural and Dairy Association wrote other letters. He may be a great farmer. I have heard of most of the great farmers; I have known some of them; I have been on the Dalrymple farm in Dakota; I know John Alexander, in my own State, and other great farmers; but I never heard of Joseph H. Reall, of 189 Chambers street, New York, as being the guardian of the great dairy interest of this country till this bill came up. He may be. I do not know him and have nothing to say against him. I do not think he is known in my part of the country. On the 13th of April, 1886, from the National Hotel at Washington he writes:

NATIONAL HOTEL, Washington, D. C., April 13, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: We have just closed a three days' hearing before the committee of Congress, to whom our bill regulating the manufacture and sale of imitation butter was referred. There were present during its sessions representatives of the butter trade of New York, Chicago, and Baltimore, over thirty members of Congress, and the leading dairymen from several States. The bill was earnestly advocated and the interest of the committee thoroughly aroused. The best measure that can be passed will be reported, and we have assurances of favorable action by Congress. Over fifty Senators and Representatives have already pledged their support, and we are getting new accessions to our ranks all the time. The question is attracting more attention and interest than any subject that has been before Congress in twenty years.

As there are thousands of bills in Congress awaiting action, and every member of the Senate and House is engrossed with his multiform duties, it is necessary that the most popular measure should be followed up personally to secure prompt action, and I therefore remain in Washington with some able assistants for the purpose of keeping our bill in line. The success of our work means the most important results to the dairy industry of America ever accomplished, as it will save it from ruin and restore it to prosperity. Its importance can not, therefore, be overestimated, nor can we do too much for success.

We have been engaged in the effort now culminating, that of securing national legislation, for many months, and it has involved much expense, including the holding of the national convention in New York at a cost of nearly $500, besides a vast amount of correspondence, traveling, &c., and there is much to be undergone yet.

We are in urgent need of funds to pay the remainder of the expense already incurred and to cover the work that remains to be done. I am giving the work my whole time and attention, of course free of charge, but I must have help in the expense, as I can not afford it myself. I therefore earnestly appeal to you for such contribution as you can make. Please send me here, by check or otherwise, as much as you can spare yourself, and collect from others for the cause. Any sum will be acceptable and appreciated.

Then, after giving names of some who are interested, he says:

Please also circulate the inclosed petitions and get the names of every farmer, dairyman, and factoryman you can reach at once, and return to me as soon as possible to above address. Write to each Senator and Member of Congress from your State urging the passage of our bill, and request everybody to do the same; especially ask that the bogus article be taxed at least 10 cents per pound.

Now is the time for prompt, effective work. Aid us all you can, and we will win the great battle for honest industry.

We have succeeded in interesting Congress far beyond my most sanguine expectations. Our bill is the only practicable way of controlling the bogus-butter fraud, and it will assist in making our State laws effective. By a long pull and a strong pull and a pull all together we shall succeed, and in succeeding confer a lasting blessing on the dairy interests of our country.

I will send you a copy of my address, delivered before the committee, if you desire it and will so advise me.

Please favor me with an early response, at the above address, and oblige

Yours, very truly,

JOSEPH H. REALL,
President American Agricultural and Dairy Association.

P. S.—If you can not do more, send $5 for a membership in the association, and get all you can to do likewise. This will be but a small sum to you in proportion to the good it will do you and all concerned. As showing the interest our movement is exciting, I inclose copy of articles from the Washington Star, one of the leading journals of the country.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky to read again the designation by the writer of himself.

Mr. BECK. He claims to reside at 169 Chambers street, New York. He writes from the National Hotel, Washington, and signs himself "President American Agricultural and Dairy Association."

Mr. VOORHEES. I had not the least idea before that the agricultural interests of the country were confided to 169 Chambers street.

Mr. BECK. I had not the least idea of it before, but strange things happen. I read these letters, sent to me by gentlemen, to illustrate how petitions are manufactured, just as the other petitions I read were manufactured in regard to Oklahoma land grants, &c.; just as the cider vinegar interest got up an excitement in 1883 in the States of New York and New Jersey, and all sorts of people petitioned for the passage of the Miller vinegar amendment. At last it comes to this——

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. I want to inquire what the criticism was upon these petitions and upon Mr. Reall and upon the mode of obtaining petitions. I suppose the Senator does not wish to curtail the right of the American people to petition Congress.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; I do not pretend to curtail anybody's rights. The active managers have all found out how to do it. Whether Mr. Reall is president of the American Association or whether he is the patentee of a butter separator, or whatever he may be, he has a right to get all the help he can, and all the petitions he can. He has a right to humbug the American Senate if he can, and if he can make us believe that these petitions are genuine, when he may have gotten them up himself or perhaps paid for them out of the money he received from the millions he assumed were backing him, he has a right to do it. If he got $5 apiece from all his friends he may be well paid for all the trouble he has undertaken. I do not say anything against the man's right nor his action. He is an enterprising citizen, undoubtedly.

Mr. MILLER. Do I understand the Senator to state that the petitions which have come here in favor of this bill are bogus and have been manufactured by Mr. Reall?

Mr. BECK. I do not know whether they are bogus or not.

Mr. MILLER. I understood the Senator to use that language.

Mr. BECK. I have read what Mr. Reall wrote begging people to send petitions to him. Is Mr. Reall a distinguished farmer of this country? I do not know him.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Reall of course can take care of himself.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator does not know him——

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. Reall is a respectable farmer.

Mr. BECK. Do you know him?

Mr. SEWELL. He is a citizen of New Jersey, a respectable gentleman.

Mr. BECK. Living in Chambers street, New York.

Mr. SEWELL. He has an office in Chambers street, as a great many people have who reside just across the river.

Mr. BECK. Is he a butter maker?

Mr. SEWELL. He is engaged in the sale of dairy products.

Mr. BECK. He is a butter seller. Has he a patent for a butter separator?

Mr. SEWELL. I do not think he has.

Mr. BECK. I care nothing about that. I have nothing to say against him. I have said nothing against him. I have read his communications.

Mr. MILLER. I think the Senator used language which perhaps if he had considered it he would not have employed. If I understood him correctly, he stated that these petitions which have come in in favor of this bill were bogus and had been manufactured. All I can say about it is that those which I have received from my own State have almost always come from gentlemen whom I personally know, living in various parts of the State. Undoubtedly the heading of these petitions or the paper upon which they were written was sent out from the central organization, as such things are always done; but I have not presented any petitions here from the State of New York that have not been entirely genuine. In nearly every case they have been forwarded to me and vouched for by gentlemen of high character, nearly all of whom I know personally.

As to the other petitions which have come here I know nothing about them at all, but as the farmers of this country are scattered over a vast territory, and are not thoroughly organized, it is undoubtedly necessary that some gentlemen having an interest in the matter should undertake to communicate with them and to bring out their views by petitions and by letters. That is what has been done in this case, and I think done quite correctly and very properly. That is all I desire to say about the petitions.

Mr. BECK. I did not reflect upon any one any further than to give the facts. They are before the Senate. A Chambers street merchant in New York is here in Washington begging for money and having petitions sent to him and urging everybody to get up petitions and letters to Senators and Represenatives, and we are all to believe that they originated at home because of the intense interest our people took in the matter. It looks a good deal as if there was a strong effort made to put a pressure upon Congress that the people themselves were not trying to do.

But I have said, and I repeat, I care nothing about these things. I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] goes as far as Congress can go in dealing with the subject. I never yet ate any oleomargarine or butterine in my life that I know of. I am so prejudiced against it that I never will eat it unless I change my mind; but I do not propose to prevent anybody else from using it if he wants to. The Senator from Delaware says if I have eaten it without knowing it, it has not hurt me.

I do not think it has, and I know that a good many people believe that it is a substitute for butter more wholesome than much of the butter that is made in the country. I have eaten butter, I am sorry to say, that was not as good as I should like to have it. I assume that there are others who like butterine and oleomargarine. That is not the question. If it ought not to be made at all let us say so, if we think we have the power. Taxing it does not make it any better. Pretending to tax it for the purpose of raising revenue (which is the only ground on which we can impose a tax) when we do not mean any such thing is by indirection to strike it down unjustly and illegally under the guise of imposing a tax. I insist that is not good legislation, and therefore I oppose this bill in its present shape.

I am willing to have the article branded and marked and to punish all evasions of the law which imposes brands and marks. I am willing to make men tell the truth in regard to what they are selling and give people who want to buy a chance to know what they are buying, especially in regard to what they propose to eat. No one would go further than I in that direction, but I will not by indirection do what I can not do directly.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to make a brief contribution to the literature of this debate, and will ask the Secretary to read from the second annual report of the chief executive viticultural officer to the board of State viticultural commissioners of California within the lines marked in the document I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

We have reason to welcome the efforts of viticulturists in States east of the Rocky Mountains to establish their industry. In many cases they have made notable progress. The vine-growers of the East, whose ambition is to substitute pure wine of native production for spurious compounds, now foolishly permitted and indirectly encouraged by the Government, will not only assist in enlarging the field of American industry, but will be a powerful ally to his brethren in California. We should appeal to him to unite with us in perfecting legislation to check the abuses of adulteration and imposition, and to demonstrate that, while the Government wisely fosters viticulture, it does not intend to overlook fraud and deception.

SPURIOUS AND ALULTERATED WINES.

There is a law which provides for the taxation of spurious and adulterated wines. It has been nullified by a construction of the Internal Revenue Department. Our commission has authorized its president to take steps toward obtaining a new ruling. If the law proves ineffective, it is the duty of Congress to make it operative in such a manner that consumers may be protected from imposition and producers against ruinous competition.

To illustrate the magnitude of this evil, I will quote a portion of a letter which I have recently received from a wine dealer of New York. He writes under date of August 7, 1884:

* * * As I have tasted here some very good Burgundy wine made in California from the Pineau grape, I don't doubt for a moment that your State will produce in a few years as good wine as is produced in France. The greatest enemy you will have to contend with is the spurious wines. As long as they are permitted to be manufactured the wines of the country will linger under a cloud, as much of the wine sent here from California is "doctored," and consequently its quality is spoiled.

I know two manufacturers of this kind of trash, one with the name of —— on Second avenue, and the other Messrs. ——, Broad street, New York. They each manufacture over 15,000 gallons a month. The former sells it as it is made to the wine dealers throughout the city and country, and also mixes some himself; but the latter are all using it for mixing with California wines, and send it to every State in the Union. Is it to be wondered then that California wines do not gain reputation as rapidly as they should, and as their fair quality deserves?

I am pleased to see that you will try to influence members of Congress in respect to enforcing the law. All the grape growers of the country and the honest wine dealers should petition to have the manufacture of this vile stuff prohibited.

The essential features of these spurious wines are corn spirits, glucose, acids, and flavoring matters, all of which can be put together very cheaply. When mixed with pure wines dishonest retailers use the compounds to enable them to undersell those who sell pure goods. The consumers are imposed upon, money obtained under false pretenses, and our producers are prevented from enlarging their markets by reason of the unpopularity which commercial swindling causes. The stamp of the internal revenue should follow and identify these goods throughout the trade upon all forms in which they reach the actual consumer. Such a law would be more effectively enforced than one prohibiting spurious manufactures-

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to enlarge the scope of this bill with the view of enabling our friends who are in favor of it to correct some other evils in this country besides that alleged to exist in regard to butter.

It was announced by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] that this was a government of compromises and that the producers of one commodity and one section of the country ought to consent to the protection of different commodities in the different sections of the country, and so on. I do not agree to that view. I do not agree to the principle of this bill, but I was asked for an explanation of my amendment, and I do not know that I can give a better explanation than by having a little more literature read.

I ask the Secretary to read a letter from Mr. Charles A. Wetmore, chief executive viticultural officer of California, to T. H. Sherley, esq., of Louisville, Ky. Mr. Wetmore does not appear to have been so enterprising as Mr. Reall, who resides in Chamber street, New York, and therefore has not flooded Congress with quite so many stereotyped petitions as have come in under the head of bogus butter. I should like to have that read by way of throwing light on some frauds in this country, with a view to giving our friends on the other side an opportunity to vote to suppress those.

LOUISVILLE, April 15, 1886.

GENTLEMEN: Permit me to refer again to the subject of our interview of this morning, and to explain briefly the substance of the legislation demanded of Congress in the interest of genuine wine producers.

Our most pressing needs are, namely:

First. Legislation to prevent fraud and imposition in the wine trade, compelling the products which are known as imitation, bogus, or compounded wines to be sold under stamps which shall identify their true character to all purchasers, and suppressing entirely all such as contain adulterations known to be deleterious to the public health; wines that are pure to be so marked that public confidence in them may be established, with stringent penalties for false markings.

Second. In the making of genuine sweet wines, the privilege of distilling a portion of our grape products, free of tax, to obtain pure wine spirits to fortify such sweet wines according to commercial standard with limitations to such privilege as follows: The wines so fortified not to contain after fortification, including the natural strength of the wines as produced by fermentation, more than 24 per cent. of absolute alcohol. No wines to be so fortified, free of tax, except such as are positively sweet and showing not less than 4 per cent. of sugar according to tests made with Balling's must scale after the distillation of the spirit; this privilege to be limited to the original place of wine-making and to apply only to pure wines made from grapes and to wine-makers who distill their own wine spirits.

In case of wines intended for exportation, however, fortification with wine spirits, free of tax, withdrawn from bond, for any kind of wine and to any extent demanded by foreign markets, under supervision of internal-revenue service, with provisions against fraud and to prevent the reimportation of dry wines without payment of the tax on the spirits used in fortification.

In connection with this brief statement I refer you to the printed copy of resolutions adopted at the last meeting of the State Viticultural Commission of California, of which I am a member and the authorized executive officer.

We have recently been informed that an effort has been made to obtain consent of parties interested to the support of a bill permitting the use of any spirits, withdrawn from bond, in fortifying any kind of wine to the limit of 24 per cent. of absolute alcohol, free of tax. Such a bill would be fatal to the production of genuine wines, would destroy the sweet wine production of vine-growers while fostering the production of imitation goods, and would lead to unlimited stretching and adulterations of dry wines; moreover, it would prevent the use in wines of the genuine wine spirits of the vine-grower and wine-makers on account of the exceedingly low price of other spirits when free of tax. In other words, such a bill might be advocated by those who desire to compel wine-makers to use grain spirits in sweet wines instead of the products of the vineyards and by compounders of artificial wines, but could never be advocated by the vine-growers.

We know we have to contend against the selfish interest of the latter class of spurious wine-makers; but we do not believe that distillers of grain spirits desire to extend the use of their products by sacrificing the interests of the vine-growers. It has been reported, nevertheless, that some one professing to represent distillers of grain spirits has antagonized the demand of the sweet-wine makers, threatening opposition of distillers unless the privilege of fortification, free of tax, be extended so as to include their products. We believe that this collision has been the result of a misunderstanding of the question. The interests of grain distillers are not antagonized by the genuine wine-makers; on the contrary, our sympathies are with them in respect to many important points, having in view relief from oppressive laws and the improvement of the quality of goods on the market.

Such antagonism as has been reported to be threatened would, if the report be true, lead to resistance that would surely be unfortunate for all concerned. The vine-growers will resist with all their influence any effort to permit the use of grain spirits, free of tax, in fortifying wines. The reason why we need the free use of wine spirits in fortifying sweet wines, and why we would oppose such use in dry wines for domestic trade, have been fully explained to you.

This letter is addressed to you to ascertain whether in making the demands which are set forth there is any reason why any distillers should oppose us, and with the hope also that it may elicit from you some expression positively encouraging us by your sympathy. If we have your sympathy and influence in these matters we shall confidently hope that the relations between our industries will be such as to secure by harmonious action other laws in which we shall be more mutually interested.

Respectfully, yours,

CHAS. A. WETMORE,
Chief Executive Viticultural Officer of California.

T. H. SHERLEY, Esq.,
Chairman Committee on Manufactures Board of Trade, and Vice-President Kentucky Distillers' Association, Louisville, Ky.
GEO. T. STAGG, Esq.,
President Carlisle O. F. C. Distilleries, Frankfort, Ky.

CARLISLE & O. F. C. DISTILLERIES,
Frankfort, Ky., April 16, 1886.

SIR: After duly considering your written communication addressed by you to our Mr. Stagg, in which you set forth the legislation desired by the vine-growers and brandy distillers in the interest of pure, healthful wines and brandies and for protection against spurious imitations and poisonous adulterations and compounds, we take pleasure in saying we heartily wish you success in your efforts and will cheerfully lend you any aid in our power to that end. Genuine wines, brandies, and whiskies are pure. Pure wines, brandies and whiskies, when matured by age, are healthful, and their use, to the exclusion of bogus, manufactured compounds sold as wines, brandies, and whiskies, will do more to prevent drunkenness and its attendant evils and to promote temperance and its attendant blessings than can ever be attained through prohibition, local option, or high license.

If Congress would make a law prohibiting the adulteration of all kinds of wines and spirits, intended for consumption as beverages, or use as medicines, it would be a deserved protection to the interests of honest vine-growers and distillers, and a much-needed protection to the health of all consumers, whether as beverages or as medicines.

Distillers of fine whiskies generally will indorse your proposed measures, and we think they should assist you by their influence with their Representatives and Senators in getting early and favorable action on them.

Yours, truly,

E. H. TAYLOR, JR., COMPANY,
By GEO. T. STAGG, President.

CHAS. A. WETMORE, Esq.,
Vice-President and Chief Executive Officer, State Viticultural Commission of California, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BUTLER. I have had these letters read with a view of explaining to the Senate the object of the amendment I have offered. I stated a while ago that I was opposed to this bill in principle, and I shall vote for this amendment with the understanding that if the amendment shall be adopted I shall then vote against the bill. I believe that this whole system of legislation is not only unconstitutional, but vicious in the extreme.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. If this amendment which is proposed were now before this body as a distinct bill would the Senator from South Carolina support it?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. I announced distinctly that I was opposed to all this class of legislation as vicious and unconstitutional.

Mr. MILLER. I can hardly see the object then of the Senator offering it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. My object is to test the sincerity of the advocates of this bill. They announce that they want to suppress a fraud by using the taxing power of the Government to destroy a legitimate, bona fide, honest industry; that they desire to suppress what they call a fraud; and I simply want to call their attention to the fact that there are other grievances and other evils of farmers in this country, grape-growers, viticulturists, and wine-makers; that they also would like to have the interposition of Congress to prevent fraud. I merely desire to give the friends of this bill an opportunity to vote for that also to suppress as great an evil, or, as I think, a greater evil than the one of which the Senator complained the other day in his speech. That was my object. Later on in the debate I may have something to say, but for the present I shall content myself with this explanation of the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I dislike very much to have the Senator from South Carolina vote in favor of an amendment to which he is opposed in principle, and I know that a great many of the Senators here are in favor of the principle contained in that amendment. I did not listen to it carefully and can not say whether I would approve of all its provisions or not; but of the principle I am decidedly in favor. Therefore, in order that the Senator from South Carolina may not feel constrained to vote for a measure which he does not approve and thinks unconstitutional, and in order that other Senators may not be compelled to vote against a proposition which they believe to be right in itself but think it would be unwise to put upon this bill, as it might endanger its final passage, I move to lay this amendment on the table, and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator to withdraw that. Let us have the courage of our convictions.

Mr. MILLER. I can not withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator will not cut off debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from South Carolina that the motion of the Senator from New York is not debatable.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not debating it. I simply asked the Senator from New York to withdraw it so as to let us have a fair, honest, even-handed vote on the amendment, and not dodge the question.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator having stated that he was against his own proposition, I want to save him from that sort of vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be able to take care of myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CALL. I did not wish to debate it; but as the amendment is a long one and can not be reported without consuming time, I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if his amendment proposes to do anything more than require these articles to be labeled and stamped?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; it imposes a tax.

Mr. CALL. What is the amount of the tax?

Mr. BUTLER. I forget the amount now.

Mr. HARRIS. It proposes to apply the principle of the bill to adulterated wines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. SEWELL (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON] is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. EDMUNDS (when Mr. MORRILL'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MORRILL] is, as I have often said, absent sick, and is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], but if my colleague were here he would vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] on the passage of this bill. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. BERRY (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, and announce my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—32.

So the amendment was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it right to occupy ten minutes or so of the time of the Senate in trying to correct the impression which Senators opposed to this bill seem to have that we are taxing one legitimate and honest industry of the country of our own citizens for the benefit and protection of another legitimate and honest industry. I do not understand it that way at all. If I did I should vote against it.

I suppose, Mr. President, that out of every hundred people who eat these compounds called oleomargarine and butterine and whatever, at least ninety-five, and I believe ninety-nine, eat them supposing them to be butter in the sense in which our grandfathers and grandmothers, and we when we were children, understood that term; that the workingman and the laborer and the small village shopkeeper, everybody that keeps house and everybody that has anything to do with the social progress of this Republic of ours, when he gets this commodity gets it supposing it to be butter in the sense in which I have defined it, and he eats it on that supposition; and if when he bought it he knew that it was another and a different thing and did not contain any butter at all, he would not have bought it. And I think that is just as true of the poorest of the poor laborers as it is of the richest of the rich, whoever they may be, because no man is so poor, no man is so weak, no man is so feeble, no man is so debased as to like to be cheated Whether a man be a truth-telling man himself and a true-dealing man himself, he wishes every other man to tell him the truth and to deal truly with him. When therefore I can do anything to repress a fraud upon this class of people I think I am doing them a service, and I am sure they will believe that I am doing them a service.

The same on the other hand is true of the farmer, the butter-maker of the country. When he sells his butter he wishes it to be sold as butter, he wishes to get the benefit of it, and he has a right to get the benefit of manufacturing and selling the thing that he produces for what it really and truly is; but if he undertakes to sell butter for something that is finer than that, if he melts it up and turns it by some contrivance into an imitation of salad oil, he would be called a cheat who ought to be repressed, so far as the power of the law-making part of the Government can go to repress him.

Nobody disputes that in the abstract, I suppose. If anybody does dispute it, then we have this simple proposition: The fact exists over this immense Republic that into every household that does not make its own butter, and therefore knows what it is doing, there is brought a fraud and a cheat, and when I say "every household" I allow for the very small percentage of people who eat this commodity knowing it to be what it is. In that state of things I should suppose we would all agree that whatever constitutional power a State may have, or the United States may have, ought to be exerted to repress it. I take it nobody can deny that.

Then we come to the constitutional difficulties presented by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and other gentlemen who have presented them with great ingenuity, the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] in particular, I now remember, about the bill being itself something like oleomargarine; that is to say, a fraud and a humbug, a pretense. I deny it. The taxing power of every civilized community from the time taxes in a systematic way began down to this day, of every State of this Union, of every civilized country upon the face of the globe, has always been exerted by discrimination of burdens, by selections, by exemptions, in order to promote the general welfare of that community as it appeared to the persons who had the power to make its laws.

I do not believe there is an instance in the whole history of civilization of a systematic tax law that did not on the face of it show that the taxing power was exerted not merely with an eye to getting money into the treasury, but also with the distinct and avowed purpose, proper, wholesome, beneficial to the community, of taxing by discrimination against employments and objects which were not so beneficial to the whole community as others—some of them may be deleterious—and by exempting, which is the same thing, some things which were so universally for the general benefit, as churches and charities and schoolhouses and so on from taxation entirely, which involves precisely the same principle.

The Congress of the United States by the Constitution, as everybody agrees, has power to impose customs taxes called duties, and if you turn to the standing customs laws of the United States from the beginning of the Government down to this day, you will find in those tax laws prohibitions against the bringing into this country of sundry things which are supposed by the lawmaking power to be deleterious to its general welfare. There is one section of the Revised Statutes of the United States which embraces an enumeration of those things.

Upon what principle does it go? It goes upon the principle that the Constitution has expressed in terms that taxes, &c., are to be imposed to pay the debts, to provide for the common defense, and to provide for the general welfare of the United States; that is, to exert the taxing power in such a way, by such exceptions, by such prohibitions, by such differentiations of burdens as shall promote the general good of the whole body of society. That is the express purpose of the taxing power, as much as it is the express power to pay the debts and provide for the common defense of the people of the United States.

The taxing power of the United States is just as extensive, just as supreme, just as illimitable as the taxing power of every State is; and will anybody stand up and deny that it is within the just competence, in the legislative sense (I am not now speaking of the judicial sense at all, because everybody gives up that and admits that this measure is constitutional in court, so far as I have heard), of any State to make such a provision? In every State of this Union, I repeat, discriminations of this kind, involving precisely the same principle, have been in operation by common and univeral consent from its foundation down to now.

I happen to have here an instance of it which I have taken simply because my honorable friend from Texas assailed the constitutional principle in its legislative sense of this bill as making a discrimination against one kind of manufacture and one operation of business and in favor of another—the statutes of the State of Texas. I turn to their tax laws, and I find that special and onerous taxes are laid, just as I have said, in general, upon a great variety of operations which are supposed some of them to be less beneficial to the general welfare than others. Some of them are supposed, I imagine, as they would be in most States if carried on at all, to be rather injurious to the general welfare, and yet not so injurious as to require the sovereign power to prohibit them altogether, but if they are to go on at all they are to go on bearing a burden out of proportion to the value of their operation, and they are to pay this burden of taxation because they ought to be discouraged.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator mean to have the Senate understand that the State of Texas authorizes a tax for any other purpose, than that of raising revenue to support the government of the State of Texas?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I do not. I do not mean to say that the Congress of the United States authorizes a tax for any other purpose, or that any State does. There is a difference between purpose and motive, as I understand. The purpose of this bill on its face and in its effect is to put a certain amount of money into the Treasury of the United States, which will be paid out under appropriations made by law, and not otherwise, and for objects that the Constitution authorizes, and not other objects. That is the purpose and effect of the bill. The motive which leads us to support it is the same motive which leads every State; and, as I say, I only take Texas to illustrate, for it is just so in Vermont, although we prohibit some things that Texas allows; it is just so everywhere. The motive which leads the taxing power to discriminate in favor of one operation of society or one species of property and against another is the motive of intending to promote in the best way it can the general good of the whole body of the community.

Otherwise, as my friend [Mr. DAWES] suggests, the simple mission of every taxing power would be merely a horizontal proposition to tax everything according to its appraised value, and to deny the right of any State and of Congress to tax any special employment or calling of any kind; you could not require a license for anything, for that is a special and peculiar affair; you could not have any State to raise revenue except simply to say there shall be an appraisal of everything that can be felt or seen that is property, and levy a uniform rate upon it for carrying on the operations of the society of a State as well as of the United States; for I repeat, as it is important in my mind, that the taxing power of the United States is just as complete, just as illimitable, just as sovereign as is the taxing power of every State; and I never heard anybody deny it.

Now, let me take Texas, just to illustrate, because, as I say, Vermont is just the same, except that we prohibit some things that Texas allows; but that is a question of internal discretion. Texas, for instance, lays a very heavy tax upon liquor dealers, a less heavy tax upon lager-beer sellers, a still less heavy tax upon merchants, a heavier tax than upon merchants on drummers, a still heavier tax upon patent-medicine peddlers, as it is generally supposed that most people can get along without patent medicines, I presume; and upon every fortune-teller a tax of $200 a year is laid. A man who tells one single fortune is taxed $200. Why? What is the principle upon which that is done? I can run down through a great list of other things, but I do not wish to take up the time. It is upon the solid and just principle that the business of fortune-telling is not necessary to the welfare of a State, and while the State chooses for the time being not to prohibit it altogether, as it is an innocent delusion or whatever, the men who tell fortunes or the women who tell fortunes are to pay for every year of their occupation $200; and so on.

As I said, the principle upon which that rests is (and I could run through a long list of other things) that the taxing power of the State of Texas, like the taxing power of every other State and of the United States, is exercised wisely and judiciously by imposing extraordinary taxes upon those occupations and employments which are not so useful to the community as others, and still heavier taxes upon those occupations and employments which are of no benefit to the community, even if they are sufficiently innocent in themselves to be tolerated at all.

That being the principle, Mr. President, when you come back to its application to this instance we find the fact to be—at least I do—that while the manufacture of oleomargarine as such may be admitted to be a perfectly legitimate performance, and as such may be admitted for the purpose of this argument to be just as legitimate and worthy as the manufacture of butter (for the purpose of this argument I say), its effect upon society is a fraud and a cheat upon ninety-five one-hundredths of the people who eat it, and a wrong and a fraud upon the people who make the honest thing and sell the honest thing that it pretends to be when it is sold to the man who has to eat it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Simply with a view of understanding his position, because I really should like to understand it. Do I understand the Senator to say that the taxing power of Congress has no limitation whatever upon it, and that it may go on and tax, we will say, bogus oil or bogus sugar or bogus candy or bogus wine or bogus vinegar without limit—I understand the Senator to take that ground—without regard to the requirements of the Treasury for revenue? Do I understand that to be his position?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was not what I said, Mr. President.

Mr. BUTLER. But does not the Senator agree to that proposition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I do not agree to it for the purposes of the argument that I am now making, whether it is right or wrong in the abstract. My proposition now, which is enough for this bill, is that the purpose of the bill as distinct from its motive or a part of its motive is to put money into the Treasury, and that is its effect. That is the tax. The motive which leads me and others to vote for it is that we are discriminating and levying a tax upon the people of the United States in such a way as that while it brings money into the Treasury to be spent on appropriations made by law for legitimate objects it discourages fraud and encourages truth.

Mr. BUTLER. Whether the Treasury needs the money or not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a question for the Senator and for me. I think the Treasury needs the money.

Mr. BUTLER. Ah!

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to take the taxes off from some other present objects of taxation and increase them upon this so long as it is the mere instrument of fraud, and so keep the revenues within a proper bound. I do not know that they are yet. As to these tales we have heard told about an enormous surplus of the revenue in the Treasury, when we come to examine the obligations of the United States as they would be if they were the obligations of a private banker or a financial institution we shall find, I suspect, that we have not any such enormous surplus of money as many people seem to suppose. But that is apart from this question.

I have never heard the constitutionality of a tax yet attacked upon the ground that the tax was unnecessary. That is a question of reason, a question of discretion, a question of judgment, but it is not a question of constitutional power. Supposing the United States did not owe a dollar and that every one of its officials and servants, including Senators, served without pay, as the members of the Parliament of Great Britain do, I believe, and that there was nothing due from the United States to any human being, I take it that nobody would deny the constitutionality of a bill which should say that a direct tax should be raised of $10,000 over the whole United States and put into the Treasury, without saying what it was for, as no proper tax law ever did say what a tax was for, only to provide the Treasury with the means that the law-making power should afterward use for the common benefit and general welfare.

Mr. BUTLER. I of course do not desire to place my opinion against that of the Senator from Vermont, but for fear that he might think by my remaining silent that I agreed to that proposition, I will say that I am not able to see that it is constitutional. Congress has no such power under the Constitution whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say in the case I have supposed that the judicial department of the Government, which was organized for that purpose, would hold that it was an unconstitutional tax, and that he and I could resist the payment of our share?

Mr. BUTLER. I can not undertake to say what the judicial department of the Government would hold, but I do not believe that Congress has any power under the Constitution to levy a tax for any purpose except for revenue; and not requiring revenue, I think that the exercise of that power would be clearly in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Taking that then as the Senator states it, it would be a clear defense for him and me, if the Congress of the United States to-day, on his statement that we do not need any money for revenue, should impose a tax per capita according to population upon the States, a tax of $1 apiece, that we could resist the collection of that tax in the courts of law of the United States by proving that Congress had not any present need for the money, and would not know what to do with it if it got it. I can not agree to that proposition. I never saw anything of that kind in any of the innumerable tax questions which have been raised in the courts. I never saw such a thing hinted at either in the judgment of the courts or in the arguments of counsel.

There is one very interesting instance of motive and purpose that has been drawn in question in the act that taxed 10 per cent. per year on the circulation of State banks, State institutions created by a State, carried on under its authority by a franchise only derived from the sovereignty of the State. A bank called the Veazie Bank in a case reported I think in eighth Wallace resisted the payment of this tax upon the ground, among others, that the purpose, intent, and motive, taking it fore and aft, as sailors would say, from beginning to end, of Congress was to abolish and destroy the circulation of State banks. Everybody knows that that was its purpose. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States held, as they were bound to hold, that they had nothing to do with the motive of the legislative power in exerting a function which the Constitution had directly reposed on it, and that if the effect of the tax, as it was admitted to be, would be to absolutely destroy and put out of existence all the circulation of the State banks, it was a perfectly legitimate exercise of the constitutional power of Congress, and it would be for the people to say whether Congress had exercised the power of taxation in a just way or not; that there was no question of law about it at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Was not that decision upon the principle that it was the duty of Congress to provide a uniform currency for the United States? Was not that the leading principle in that case?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it was a tax principle. It was a tax law.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was a tax law and a tax principle.

Mr. BUTLER. By Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we come back to the simple proposition that in the judicial sense a judicial court can neither inquire into the object or purpose to which the money is to be devoted when it comes into the Treasury, nor into the motive of the legislative power in laying such a tax. When you come back to our constitutional duty as legislators, bound by the same Constitution to proceed upon just principles for the common welfare of the United States, which in terms, I repeat, we are authorized and required to look to in the levying of taxes, we come back to the proposition that here is an instrumentality of revenue carried on, the effect if not the object of which is to cheat and defraud every consumer of that commodity, and in ninety-five instances in a hundred it does cheat and defraud him, whether he be poor or whether he be rich.

That being the case, acting upon the principles that every taxing sovereignty has acted upon, every State in the Union, South Carolina and Vermont alike, we discriminate against frauds and tax them heavily, while we do not undertake to tax the honest and useful employments in which everybody may engage and which everybody knows the truth of. There is the distinction.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator to say that Congress has not the power directly to suppress these frauds by criminal statute. I should like to know his opinion on that subject, if Congress has the direct power to suppress these frauds he speaks of by criminal statute, making it a penal offense to commit such a fraud?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it has, except in the District of Columbia and the Territories.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As a regulation of commerce I have no doubt that Congress would have the power to say that no false and fraudulent commodity of this kind should be transported from one State to another except upon regulations which would operate in effect to prevent its being gotten out of one State and into another. That may be, but that does not touch the question. To go back to the tariff laws, Congress has no right to say that no obscene publication shall be sold in the streets of New York, but it has the right to say, as it has from 1789 down to now, that no obscene publication shall be brought into the State of New York from any foreign country.

Mr. BUTLER. That is under the postal clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, not at all.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a regulation of commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So we come back to the simple proposition——

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Vermont spoke of the case of the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, and stated very correctly that that was an exercise of the taxing power to destroy the circulation of the State-bank notes. I should like to call his attention to the ground upon which the court placed the exercise of that power. They say that Congress, inasmuch as it has the control over the circulation of its own notes, "may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation of any notes, not issued under its own authority." Without this power its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country would be futile, and upon that ground the court decided that Congress may either by the taxing power or in any other way suppress the circulation of a competing currency. But they do put it upon the ground that Congress has the power to forbid the circulation of a currency that competes with that established by Congress. Here there is no pretense of course that Congress has the power to suppress the industry which is aimed at by this tax.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, that was one of the grounds, and the Senator will find the other I have stated, and still a third one. The court had three or four very good reasons for deciding as it did. But we do not stand upon an implied power to protect the circulation of the United States in that case as applied to this. We stand upon the express power that the Constitution in terms reposes in Congress to levy taxes in such a way as to promote the common welfare of the people of the United States, and if it is not to promote the common welfare of the people of the United States to protect fifty millions of consumers who suppose they are eating butter when they are cheated into buying what is not butter then I do not know what the common welfare is.

I had supposed that the common welfare even in this day was to repress, so far as we had the power to do it, frauds and cheats, just as it was true at the common law in England from whence we came that the man who sold this very thing, if it had existed, under a false label as pretending to be one thing when it was another was guilty of a misdemeanor at the common law, and he could be indicted and punished for it, just as we know as between private citizens that the man who undertakes to sell his goods under a trade-mark that pretends they are the goods of somebody else has committed a wrong which a court of equity will enjoin. So we have here the express letter of the Constitution requiring us to so levy our taxes as to provide for the common welfare of our people. I propose to levy them in this instance so as to provide for the common welfare of the fifty million or sixty million people who every day (and I do not know but that I am the victim of it now that I have to take my meals at a hotel) are given what is supposed to be butter and what they ask for as butter when it is not that at all; and I suppose it to be providing for the common welfare of the people of the United States when I guard the most universal and the most fundamental of its industries and the best of its people against being made the victims and sufferers by the fraud that is committed upon the consumer.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator if that might not have been obviated by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee requiring all these manufactures to be branded?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Far from it, only here in the District of Columbia. It might protect me while here, but on my way home it would not.

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the Secretary to read the language of the honorable Senator from Vermont the other day when he was discussing the river and harbor bill. His language was so in accord with my views upon such questions, and was so wise and statesmanlike, that I want to contrast it with the utterances he has just given upon this floor. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I can imagine that the people of the interior of New England, which has as many good streams in proportion to its size as any other part of the country, would be glad to have their little streams cleaned out; the floatage of logs and of timber would be vastly helped; but somehow or other the New England Representatives and Senators have not in general, or in particular so far as I know, felt at any time in the history of this Government that it was a part of the mission of the national Treasury to do that thing, or that it was a part of our mission to ask the national Congress to do it or to help us to do it. Perhaps we were wrong, but I have been brought up in that idea.

Therefore, without enumerating, as we have in the debates, two or three mere sample instances—it would take until December to go through with them all in detail, of course—I have felt and feel now that the totality of this business, instead of being beneficial in this extreme way to the public interests at large, is injurious, and that it is teaching the people of the United States in its remotest interior districts, of Vermont or of Illinois or of Mississippi, or wherever, to be looking to the national Capitol and the national Treasury for everything that is to be done instead of depending upon themselves for their local prosperity, their local progress, and their local improvement.

I do not believe that it is a good thing for a republic, and I believe the sooner we begin to be taught by the people of the United States and to teach them so far as they need it that the man who is to prosper in this world and the community that is to prosper must in respect of its immediate objects be taught to take care of itself, will have done a good work for the welfare and happiness and prosperity of the whole people.

When it comes to wide national objects, what is a real commerce and navigation between States, or a real commerce without navigation (because navigation is only a mere incident and part of commerce), a real and necessary intercourse between States that cover a continent from the Atlantic to the shores of the tranquil sea, then whatever is necessary to promote intercourse, exchange, travel, and products, unifying and solidifying the oneness of feeling that belongs to a common people, reserving their separate and independent local State rights, ought to be encouraged.

Now, where are you to draw the line? Our fathers began by drawing the line at a point that would take, I think, more than 50 per cent. out of this bill, that for all the objects which forty years ago by men as intelligent and patriotic as we are and by a people as intelligent and patriotic as we are would be thought to have been within the competence of Congress, can be reached and accomplished with less than half the money there is in this bill.

But it is in the Senate as it is everywhere else in this world, I suppose, as it is in tax bills, and tariff bills, and everything else that affects the people. If I find that a tax is to be imposed upon some particular product of the community where I happen to reside and with whose special and local interests I am identified, I feel that an equal and a similar tax in some way should be imposed upon the products and industries of the rest of my brethren in the United States for the common purpose of us all. When some product of one State or community is to be protected I naturally feel, and every other Senator naturally feels, that in some just and equal relation the products and industries that need it of the communities with whom he is specially identified ought to be protected. That makes equality; and in general it is supposed you can not have it in any other way.

Mr. BUTLER. My object in calling attention to the utterances of the Senator from Vermont, which I repeat I think were words of wisdom, was to show that the Senator has just had an opportunity of voting for the protection of another industry which has been clamoring for protection in this Congress, and has cast his vote against it. I simply desire the Senate and the country to look on that picture and then on this, and judge for itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What have I cast my vote against?

Mr. BUTLER. Against the amendment I offered. I do not know whether the Senator was in the Senate Chamber or not. The amendment I offered was to protect the wine interests of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not, thanks to the wise prudence of my friend from New York, cast my vote against it at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Practically.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not practically, because I assure the Senator from South Carolina that I should be willing to join him, either at this session or any other session, on a properly matured and carefully guarded bill, to provide for taxing every species of fraudulent manufacture that there is in this country, and, if I can, taxing it out of existence. Oleomargarine is only one, wine is another, drugs are another. Even the soap that we wash our hands and faces with every morning, and partly as a consequence of using the beef fat that ought to go into soap for making what is called butterine, &c., is a fraud and humbug, part of it, and injurious. My friend will find in me a humble but a devout follower in his crusade against all manner of lies and cheats and frauds.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad to hear it, Mr. President.

Mr. VANCE. What is before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The oleomargarine bill, so called.

Mr. VANCE. Have all the amendments been disposed of so far?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the amendments offered have been disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There is an amendment pending which I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not aware of it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the shadow even of a pretense that this is a revenue bill has been effectually removed not only by the history of the bill since it came into Congress but by the open and undisguised declaration of the Senator who has charge of it upon this floor. The bill came into Congress not from the Finance Committees of either body, but from the Committees on Agriculture.

In the closing sentence of his elaborate argument here the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] distinctly and emphatically declared that he was proud to array himself as an advocate "of protection with incidental revenue." The Senator from Vermont supplements that declaration by putting the right to enact this legislation under the general or common welfare clause of the Constitution. The logical and inevitable result of the argument just made by the Senator from Vermont is to absolutely eradicate the police powers of the States and to put into the hands of the General Government the right to control and regulate the health and food products of the people of the United States without regard to the State governments.

With great respect for that eminent jurist, I proclaim this a monstrous doctrine. It teaches the people of the United States that there is no necessity for their State governments. It says to them you must go to Washington city and to the General Government for all legislation inside your States and as to your domestic and police affairs. If his argument amounts to anything at all, it teaches this logically and nothing else, for under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution there is no use for the States, and Congress can do anything.

The power to tax is the power to destroy, and while the Senator admits that Congress can not say in so many words that a certain avocation or a certain production shall not exist within a State, in the same breath he declares that by using the taxing or revenue power we have the right to destroy any product inside of any State in this whole Union. If that does not destroy all the ideas that the fathers of the Constitution had when they created that document, if that does not reverse every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States from the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton, down to the last session of that tribunal, I can not understand constitutional history or judicial declarations.

The first question that meets us in the discussion of this bill is its purpose. Is it a revenue measure? The Senator from Vermont says that he believes there is a necessity for collecting more revenue and placing it in the Treasury of the United States, and he seeks to evade the argument by simply declaring that to be his opinion. How any intelligent legislator can come to the conclusion that this country needs more revenue to-day passes my comprehension.

I have here an estimate and statement in regard to the revenues and expenses of the Government. Of course we are compelled for the fiscal year to make simply a conjectural estimate, but we can arrive at a very near approximation to the real state of the case. We have revenue from customs duties, $190,000,000; we have revenue from internal revenue taxes, $115,000,000; we have revenue from miscellaneous sources, $30,000,000; making the total revenue for the year $335,000,000. Against this we have ordinary expenditures, $160,000,000; interest on the public debt, $45,000,000; pensions, $80,000,000; leaving for the sinking fund, &c., $50,000,000.

It has been said here and elsewhere that Congress intends to take the tax from some other product in the future, some other article that is now being taxed under the general legislation of Congress. Both parties in the last canvass declared that their mission here during this session of Congress was to reduce taxation upon the people; and yet with this surplus in the Treasury existing there as we know beyond any sort of question, we are called upon now to indulge in the most odious form of taxation, that of collecting additional excise duties or internal revenue. We are called upon to add to this system which has been odious to the American people since the days of Mr. Jefferson.

I believe that if this bill is enacted and becomes a law the Supreme Court of the United States would declare it to be constitutional, because every intendment would be made in favor of the motives that actuated Congress in passing the bill. Under the general constitutional power to impose taxes the Supreme Court would make every intendment in favor of the constitutionality of the law; but that does not relieve us as legislators. I am asked here now, not as a judge but as a legislator, to exercise the great constitutional power of taxation; and I have no doubt that if by my vote I put one dollar upon any citizen of the United States in the shape of tariff taxation or internal-revenue taxation over and above the necessities of the Government, I violate my oath of office palpably and distinctly.

If the Senator from Vermont is correct in his position then the power to tax is a police power, and as a matter of course you eradicate all inquiry as to whether the taxes are necessary to carry on the Government or not. Under the general-welfare clause, which, as Sancho Panza said of sleep, "covers one all over like a blanket," you can exercise the police powers of the State through the legislation of the General Government and you overturn every precedent and every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States from 9 Wheaton down to the last session of that tribunal.

I have no question but that the Supreme Court would assume that Congress had discovered the necessity for this tax if the bill becomes a law, but that does not relieve me from the primary inquiry which I must make as an honest legislator, have I a right to take this money out of the pockets of the people unless it is necessary to carry on the Government? Judge Miller said in a recent decision:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprise and build up private fortunes, is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of the law and is called taxation.

Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, says:

> Constitutionally a tax can have no other basis than the raising of revenue for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful.

The party of which I am a member declared in its national platform in Chicago:

> We demand that Federal taxation shall be exclusively for public purposes and shall not exceed the needs of the Government economically administered.

"Public purposes"—not to build up one industry at the expense of another, not to go into the States and outrage the police powers which are given by the Constitution to the State governments alone.

Every honest man within the sound of my voice and in this whole land knows that the bill is not to raise revenue, but that it is to be passed because of the clamor raised in the name of the dairies of the country and because all sorts of prejudice and passion are sought to be excited against the oleomargarine manufacturers as monopolists who are making enormous fortunes by fraud and outrage upon the people.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri for a moment to the legal question raised by the Senator from Vermont. By the exercise of the taxing power, or the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, we have already raised enough, and more than enough, for the needs of the Government, and now we are called upon to further exercise that power by raising a large additional amount. I ask as a legal proposition whether the exercise of a power that is unnecessary does not by the very reason that obviously it was not a necessity make it unlawful? In other words, if there be no lawful necessity for the exercise of the power, can there be a lawful reason for its exercise?

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt that it is an unlawful exercise of this power. We have no right to vote one dollar of tax upon any citizen of the United States unless it is necessary to pay the expenses and obligations of the Government.

I know that one of the popular and ordinary methods of meeting this argument from any one in this Chamber is to point to certain votes that have been given when there was some doubt as to the constitutionality of the measures for which we voted. Under the appeals of humanity, under the solicitations of friends and constituents, I have given during my public service votes here about the constitutionality of which I had very great doubt at the time, and which I certainly would not give again. That is no argument against the position I assume now.

To convict me of having given mistaken votes or bad votes does not meet the proposition as I undertake to lay it down now in regard to the bill before the Senate. The best evidence that I intend to do right is that I do not propose to give another vote where I have any doubt in regard to the constitutionality of the measure proposed. In this case I have not the slightest doubt as to my duty. I have examined this bill carefully, and have taken my position. So help me Heaven, I would leave the Senate to-morrow and close my public career before I would vote for a bill that I believe to be in its spirit unconstitutional and a greater fraud upon the taxing power of Congress than oleomargarine can be among food products.

If the position of the Senator from Vermont be correct, tear up the Constitution, take the general-welfare clause and let Congress do all that it wants to do in any way it pleases. I have always understood, and I have been taught to believe, that the Constitution as a written instrument had certain specific limitations of power upon the National Government and upon the States. I have always believed and expect, God willing, to die in the belief, that the Congress of the United States is limited in its functions by the express law and spirit of the Constitution itself.

If there is one principle dearer to the American heart than all others combined it is the idea of local self-government. It is the safeguard of the rights and liberties of the people. All history shows that every government which has ignored the great doctrine of home and individual right and responsibility and local self-government and has become a great, splendid national centralized power has been numbered among the failures in governmental history.

The doctrine which is sought to be taught here to-day ignores self-government, wipes out the rights of the States, gives to Congress all the functions and powers that I have been taught to believe belong to the domestic polity and government of the respective States.

A great deal of incoherent and idiotic literature has been sent all over this country and especially into the Halls of Congress attempting to draw a parallel between this bill and the tax upon whisky and tobacco and the tax of 10 per cent. imposed by Congress upon the State banks in the interest of the national banks. Congress possesses only that degree of power, call it police or otherwise, which is necessary to prevent a fraud upon or the destruction of a power given to it by the Constitution. If Congress has not this power, then the right of self-preservation would be denied to the Government. If this bill becomes a law and a tax be imposed upon oleomargarine, then it is the duty of Congress to defend that taxation. The tax on whisky and tobacco was levied in a great war and to preserve, as many patriotic citizens thought, the life of the Government. As incidents to laying that tax, which Congress had the constitutional right to impose, come the gauger, the collector, the supervisor, and all the machinery necessary in excise taxation.

The first question in regard to a revenue law, as I believe and as the party to which I belong believes, is simply, is the tax necessary to carry on the Government or to pay its obligations? If it is not necessary, I have no more right to impose that tax upon the humblest citizen of the United States than I have to enter his family circle and take from him the property he has acquired by his own industry. I must first answer to myself and to my conscience without regard to what the Supreme Court may afterward say, whether the necessity for this tax exists or not; and just as soon as my deliberate judgment tells me that the tax is not necessary, and that there is already a surplus in the national Treasury, my functions cease, and I have no right to impose that tax within the domain of the Government.

It is true that after Congress has come to the conclusion that this tax is necessary, then the details of the taxing law should be wisely and justly arranged. The legislator who does not make the distinction between a useful article and a simple luxury in the collecting of taxes is derelict in his duty. The power of taxation, the most enormous, the most potent for good or evil that has been put into the hands of mortal man, should be so exercised as to make it operate as equitably and justly as possible upon the objects of taxation and the owners of property.

Some years ago in discussing the tariff bill I announced the proposition upon this floor, which I have never retracted and never will, that I would never vote one dollar in any tariff law above the necessities of the General Government, but that when I became convinced that a tariff tax was necessary, I believed that the tax, with its incidental and necessary protection and its incidental and necessary burden, should be equitably distributed over the whole country. I believed then and believe now that neither the protection which, in some cases, is absolutely inevitable from the imposition of a tariff tax nor the burdens which come from it should be placed upon one section or class alone, but should be equitably and properly distributed over the whole country.

No one seeks to deny the proposition of the Senator from Vermont that the wise legislator looks to the object of taxation, the property to be taxed, and equitably imposes the burden upon the people throughout the whole country. But that is an evasion of the question in this case. I am first to determine whether the tax is necessary or not, and if I believe it to be unnecessary and that there is a surplus of money to-day in the national Treasury, I can not vote the tax of a single dollar without violating my official oath.

Mr. President, I have hardly patience to discuss what is called the revenue aspect of this bill. That proposition is so flimsy, that pretense is so naked and bald, that it is not seriously urged now in this discussion, and I come to the salient point and the only argument that has induced honest Democrats to advocate the pending bill. It is the appeal to the fair-mindedness, the hatred of fraud and counterfeits by the American people. The question of the limitation of the taxing power has been submerged in the clamor about bull butter, counterfeit butter, bogus oleomargarine, and we are asked now to abandon the constitutional and legal aspect of this question and to use the taxing power simply as a police regulation against a fraudulent food product.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter in extenso into the argument whether oleomargarine is a counterfeit or not. I read the other day a grave assertion that the Congress of the United States had as much right to punish the counterfeiting of honest butter as to punish the counterfeiting of national money. The brain which conceived this utterly ignored the fact, the plain, patent fact, that the power to issue money is expressly granted by the Constitution to the Government of the United States, and that the right to make butter is an individual right. In the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, from which the Senator from Delaware read, the power to place a 10 per cent. tax upon the issue of the State banks was expressly defended by the Supreme Court in these words:

> Congress having undertaken, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional power, to provide a currency for the whole country, may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation, and to that end may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation of any notes not issued under its own authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was not that under the general-welfare clause?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, that was under the doctrine which has been conceded by all parties, so far as I know, from the beginning of the Government, that the grant of an express power carries with it necessarily all the implied powers to its safe and proper execution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But would not that all come down to the fundamental proposition that this discrimination is made for the general welfare?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, when the Constitution gave to Congress the power to create a national money it gave to Congress that implied power necessary to defend the grant, to prevent fraud, and to see that the power granted was fairly and justly executed. I do not propose to be drawn into any discussion of the general-welfare clause, of which we have heard so much on this floor. I think that if any proposition is settled in the light of history, logically settled, it is that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution is not a separate and distinct grant of power, but is simply an incidental power, to be executed as auxiliary to the other powers which are expressly granted and within the limitations of the Constitution. It is not a separate and distinct grant of power, as has been so often claimed, but merely an auxiliary power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Shall I disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I should like to know on what constitutional principle it was that Congress in very early times, when our fathers who made it were expounding it by legislation, provided grants and gratuities to patriotic refugees from Nova Scotia, &c.; upon what principle it was that we provided donations for people who suffered from an earthquake at New Madrid by payments out of the public treasure. We paid out in those instances the public treasure that had been got in by taxation. In some instances we paid out land, which was the common property of the people, but in other instances we made grants of money, and that money was raised by taxation, as does all the money that comes into the Treasury except for land; and that comes in as a separate item. On what principle could we constitutionally appropriate money for these objects unless we could appropriate a tax?

Mr. VEST. Oh, Mr. President, I could supplement the statement of the Senator from Vermont by a long list of votes that have been given since I have been in the Senate, some of which I have given myself, as I said a few moments ago, on the appeals of humanity where there were overflows, and Senators rose here and described their constituents starving to death, and asked Congress to meet the emergency that was upon us by the donation of a few dollars. In my judgment there was no constitutional power for any such grant if closely and critically examined; but the benefit of the doubt was given to the side of humanity and the money was voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But would not my friend acknowledge the force of a contemporaneous construction, a practical application of that clause of the Constitution for a century, beginning with our fathers and coming down to now?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I know that there has been a difference of construction as to that clause of the Constitution. Answering for myself I believe in the construction given it by Mr. Jefferson, not by Mr. Hamilton, and we know very well that Jefferson left the Cabinet of George Washington upon the ground that Hamilton in his report on manufactures when Secretary of the Treasury put the right to lay a protective-tariff tax on foreign imports upon the ground that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution authorized it. Mr. Jefferson protested and stated to the President of the United States, then General Washington, that he would be compelled "under this new and strange doctrine which had been advanced by the Secretary of the Treasury to leave the Cabinet rather than to submit to the constitutional construction "which absolutely destroys the rights of the States and makes Congress absolute." Washington finally prevailed upon him to remain in the Cabinet until the 1st of the next January. But the difference between Hamilton and Jefferson was so marked, so irreconcilable as to this very general-welfare clause that Jefferson finally retired from the Cabinet on account of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Under what clause of the Constitution did Mr. Jefferson find the power to acquire the Territory of Louisiana and to levy taxes upon it and perform a variety of legislative acts in consequence of the cession? Taxes to pay the fifteen million were levied on the whole United States, and then the people of that Territory were taxed without representation. And where did he get power to do various other things all for the general welfare as all the world admits now; but a great many people disputed it then?

Mr. VEST. Mr. Jefferson believed that under the treaty-making power he had a right to acquire that territory, and of course he was compelled to pay for it. He defended it upon that ground.

Mr. MAXEY. With the consent of the Senator from Missouri, I will state that when that direct question came up as to the acquisition of Florida, the United States Supreme Court in Insurance Company vs. Canter, in 1 Peters, decided that under the war-making power or the treaty-making power Congress had the undoubted right to acquire territory. That settled the question, and it has been regarded as settled ever since.

Mr. VEST. It has been brought up here repeatedly and flung at those of us who denied this sweeping general-welfare construction that is now sought to be put upon the Constitution. I never had any doubt myself about the right to acquire Louisiana or to pay the money of the people of the United States for that territory, not only under one clause of the Constitution but more than one.

Here in the pending bill is a naked, bald assumption of the taxing power in order to protect one American industry against another. If I were forced to meet the issue between a high protective tariff and this bill, I should take the tariff because that at least has the patriotic defense of being a tax against foreigners, while this is a tax against our own people. If the taxing power of the country can be used between two American citizens, what is the result? The power to tax, as Chief-Justice Marshall said, is the power to destroy; and while the Senator from Vermont admits that Congress can not go into any State and tell its people, "You shall not manufacture oleomargarine," yet Congress can fraudulently—for it is nothing else but fraud upon the Constitution—use the taxing power so as to effect the same thing. In other words, Congress can do indirectly what it can not do directly. We evade the Constitution. We might just as well take that instrument and tear it to pieces and throw it to the winds of heaven.

We are in this bill using the revenue power of the Government as a police power, and the conclusion is irresistible, and no mortal man can answer it, if we can do that we can then make the General Government assume the functions and take the place of the States; there is no longer any necessity for local self-government or for any State government. The State of Missouri immediately occupies the relation to the General Government that a county in that State occupies toward the State government. If this assumption here to-day, that this taxing power can be used to put down a fraud, is true, it immediately becomes a police power, and the health and quarantine and inspection laws of the States all pass into the General Government, and the limitations of the Constitution are utterly ignored.

I have here the opinion of a very eminent jurist upon this question, my friend from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. Here is an opinion given by Mr. EVARTS which I thoroughly indorse upon the constitutionality of the law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in New York. That was on the statute of a State prohibiting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine and I will read the provision of the law:

> No person shall manufacture out of any oleaginous substance or substances, or any compound of the same other than that produced from unadulterated milk or of cream from the same, any article designated to take the place of butter or cheese, produced from pure, unadulterated milk or cream of the same, or shall sell or offer for sale the same as an article of food. This provision shall not apply to pure skim-milk cheese, made from pure skim milk.

Upon the constitutionality of this State statute, not an act of Congress, the eminent jurist who wrote this opinion said as follows:

> Upon the whole, then, I am of the opinion that the just judicial interpretation of the sixth section of this act will impose its penalties on the manufacture and sale therein prohibited only when the manufacture and sale of oleaginous substances for food when they are so manufactured, exposed for sale, or sold and designed as a "deception in sales in dairy products," as used in the title of the act.
> If, however, this section of the act shall be construed not as protecting the public against "deception in sales of dairy products," but as protecting dairy producers in a monopoly of human food, against the manufacture and sale of the genuine products of other oleaginous substances suited as wholesome human food, in greater or less degree, to compete with or take the place of dairy products, I am of opinion that such legislation is repugnant to our constitution. Legislation in this sense no longer adheres to the protection or guaranteeing a lawful product against simulation and deception, or protecting the public against fraud and imposition, but stands upon the avowed and unlimited discrimination in favor of monopoly, to the injury of other honest and useful producers, and the oppression of the public. It is quite plain that the moment that this legislation departs from the theory and justification of this act as limited, "to prevent deception in sales of dairy products," no proscription on the mere ground of protective monopoly of one industry can be limited by any rule of discretion in this line and style of discrimination among the people of this State and their pursuits. Hitherto, until recently, the maxims and instincts of public liberty have discountenanced all such methods of legislation. I am unwilling to tolerate the pretension that the provisions of our constitution offer no barrier to such an innovation upon freedom and equality as the creation of monopolies at the discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask him, supposing that the statute of New York which was afterward set aside by the court of appeals who held in the same way that the opinion of Senator EVARTS was, and for other reasons which they state—suppose that instead of being a prohibitory statute it had been a statute imposing a tax of 10 cents a pound on those commodities, does the Senator think that Mr. EVARTS would have given that opinion or that the court of appeals would have sustained it?

Mr. VEST. I have undertaken in my feeble way to draw a distinction between the functions of a judge passing upon the taxing power when exercised by Congress and the duty and function of a legislator creating a tax. If my friend from Vermont can not see it, undoubtedly it is my fault and not his.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do see it, but I only wanted to keep clearly in our minds the discrimination. I infer, then, that my friend from Missouri would agree that if this had been the exertion of a taxing power of 1 cent or 10 or 20 cents—because the court can not go into the quantity of the tax—it would have been held constitutional; and that his argument, that being constitutional, is addressed on this bill (which is a taxing bill) to the impropriety of levying a tax for the purpose, as he puts it, of discriminating in favor of one industry against another. Stated in that way, I should agree with him, but it is not an industry that is honest.

Mr. VEST. The Senator does not state my position. I am not discussing the propriety or the impropriety of levying this tax. I say that this bill absolutely ignores the limitations of the Constitution as to the power of Congress in regard to taxation. I say that this bill is itself a fraud and a monstrous fraud. It pretends to be a revenue bill, and its advocates here show that it is not a revenue bill. It is a police bill, and Congress has no such police power as is sought here to be exercised.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that in the suggested case he has just spoken of it would be held unconstitutional by a court, or only as an appeal to our constitutional duty not to do that sort of thing with that sort of motive?

Mr. VEST. I am talking as one legislator to his colleagues in legislation. If I were a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States and this bill came before me, I would decide in favor of its constitutionality because I would assume that Congress had not violated their oaths but had levied a tax because it was necessary to carry on the Government and pay its obligations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is fair. That brings it right down to the legislative power.

Mr. VEST. But I am not here now as a judge passing upon the constitutionality of a law already enacted. I am here acting under my oath of office and I say that when I know this Government does not need this tax I have no right to rob any citizen of one single cent. I have no right to say that I will take money out of any man's pocket when there is no public necessity for it.

There is not the shadow of a pretense in this discussion that this revenue is necessary for the Government. All disguise has been thrown off. It was thrown off when the bill came into the Senate from the House and when the Senator from New York and the Senator from Nebraska stood here and said it ought to go to the Committee on Agriculture because it was intended to protect an agricultural product, butter, that it ought not to go to the Committee on Finance, that it was not a matter of finance or revenue but a question of simple, naked protection of one agricultural product against another—a broad, naked act of prohibition and that alone.

As I said, the real defense of this bill before the public and here is that it is intended to suppress a fraud, and we have had a ghastly array, equal to that which is given of the witches' banquet in Tam O'Shanter, presented by the Senator from New York—corruption, death, decayed bones, dogs, and cats, all put into the stomachs of the people by the venders of oleomargarine. No Senator left this Chamber with anything like an appetite for dinner after listening to that ghastly speech, and yet the Senator from New York, with a full knowledge of the deadly compound, with the certainty that it was making a charnel-house out of the stomach of every American man, woman, and child, is willing to poison the whole population for 5 cents tax on a pound.

Mr. MILLER. I think the Senator must be mistaken in his reference. I said nothing about dead cats, dogs, or any other dead animal except dead cattle and hogs. He is referring to some one else.

Mr. VEST. I listened to the Senator until my stomach rebelled and I left the Chamber. [Laughter.] I presumed that he was putting all the offal and refuse in the country into oleomargarine.

It is a most remarkable fact, and yet it is glaring all through this discussion and in all these petitions and affidavits and chemical analyses, and all the arraignment of figures from learned authorities, professors, and presidents, and physicians, and divines, and eminent farmers, not one solitary word is heard from any poor devil who contracted dyspepsia or any other disease by eating oleomargarine. The poisoned people seem to be the happy people.

Mr. MILLER. They do not know it.

Mr. VEST. Of course not, and yet it is deadly. Where does the complaint come from? Where is the human being that complains of it? This bill is a part of this sumptuary system in which some people are so good and wise and pure and holy that they want to take care of all the stomachs as well as the morals of everybody else. We are to be told what we shall drink and what we shall eat and what we shall wear and how we shall worship God. And the doctrine of the commune is being taught now all over this country—that the individual is nothing and the Government is everything; that I belong to the Government, with my family, and if I do not treat my wife and children as the Government thinks right it shall interfere; and if I want to eat anything that suits me I can not do it, because it is not good for my stomach; and if I want to drink I can not do it, because I am destroying my usefulness and impairing my private fortune so that I can not pay taxes to the Government. It is the doctrine of the commune, and there are certain people in this country who are never happy unless they practice it.

Here now is the Senator from New York catching every poor fellow who can not pay 26 cents a pound for butter and can pay 12 or 14 for oleomargarine, and chokes the very life out of him because he will not take his butter. He can not have oleomargarine because it would put him into the hands of a doctor, and if he protests and says, "I like it," he is told, "But you do not know what is good for you; I am the judge, and Congress," and we shall set up a general dispensary, and physic through our laws the entire population of this country.

I do not wish to discuss the question whether it is healthy or not. I have nothing to do with that. As I will undertake to show directly, I think beyond the possibility of cavil, that is a question for the States and not for Congress, and as a member of Congress I have nothing to do with that police power at all.

But in passing I will ask the Secretary to read one article so that the Senator from New York can see that there is very good authority on the other side of this question as to the healthfulness of oleomargarine.

Mr. MILLER. I stated that it was a disputed question.

Mr. VEST. Let the Secretary read the article I have marked. I will say before the article is read that I went to the Senators from Connecticut and inquired in regard to the gentleman who is the author of it. He is a chemist in the Wesleyan University, the largest Methodist educational institution in this country. He is a chemist, and the lady, Miss Palmer, is a lady of as high character and of as much intelligence as any in this whole land. Now I want the Secretary to read that article.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE CONSPIRACY AGAINST CHEAP BUTTER.

To the Editor of the Nation:

SIR: In Boston, by a combination of municipal appropriation and private benevolence, cooking schools have been established in which girls attending the public schools, many of them from families of very limited means, are not only taught the art of cookery practically, but are told about the composition and nutritive values of foods, and how to select as well as use them most economically. The teachers are not merely ladies of large general intelligence and skill in household affairs, but have had especial training in the scientific principles that underlie the right exercise of the art they teach. One of these schools is in North Bennett street, a quarter inhabited by the poorer people of the city. Miss Palmer, the teacher in this school, in referring to the efforts made to instill right ideas of economy, says:

"I do not find much difficulty in getting my girls to see that inexpensive foods are really wholesome, nutritious, and good. * * * The children are much interested in learning the price of oleomargarine (the best is 14 cents a pound here now) as compared with that of butter. * * * No butter has been used at the North Bennett street cooking school during the past year, and, had it not been for oleomargarine, I should have rejected, on the ground of extravagance, dishes which we were thereby enabled to cook. The children buy the food they prepare, if they so desire, at the cost of the materials, and it has been my object to keep the price of even the most attractive articles so low that even the poorest girls might take them home and reproduce them there. * * * I visited a poor family yesterday (who have lately become comparatively prosperous), * * * and asked about the butter they used, and learned that they allowed themselves for cooking and table use for five persons but a pound a week at 28 cents per pound, which is the lowest price, even at this season (June), at which butter is palatable. How much better it will be for her (her mother) to use oleomargarine at 14 cents in the future! * * * When the directors of the school held their meetings there they wanted a noon lunch. I had no butter to give them, so they ate oleomargarine on their bread much more cheerfully than they would have eaten poor butter."

Miss Palmer cites other instances of the use of oleomargarine in places where oleomargarine is used with greatest satisfaction among well-to-do people, and considers its general use, especially for cooking, very advisable.

While the oleomargarine bill, which, instead of providing for regulation of the manufacture and sale of imitation butter in such ways as to prevent use of unwholesome materials, and to insure its sale on its merits, proposed to tax it so high as to bring the price up to that of butter, and render the manufacture and sale unprofitable, was pending in the House of Representatives at Washington, the Connecticut Farmer called upon its readers to keep close watch upon their Representatives in Congress, and by their future votes to "strike down any man, be he Republican or Democrat," who should not vote for the bill. Three Connecticut Representatives supported the measure, and received the warm approval of that journal. The single one who opposed it received a full measure of the threatened opprobrium.

Now notice the contrast. Science has shown how an excellent food product may be brought within the reach of that large mass of people of limited means who make up the bulk of our population—a product to whose nutritive value specialists bear unanimous testimony, and with whose flavor even the critical are content. In the exercise of an especially useful charity, a school, supported by public and private benevolence, teaches daughters of families in moderate circumstances and of the worthy poor in Massachusetts how to work toward elevation of their home life, by more refined and judicious economy in selection and use of food the cost of which makes more than half of their whole living expenses. With other things, this food product is wisely commended. But another class of the people, the dairymen, regarding this food product as interfering with their own profits, ask, not that its improper manufacture and sale, of which they justly complain, shall be regulated in accordance with the principles of legislation that justice and experience have approved, but that it shall be subjected to a tax which will not only put its price beyond the poor man's reach, but, if practicable, stop its manufacture. Is this the fairness and the wisdom which the American people will approve?

W. O. ATWATER.

CHEMICAL LABORATORY, WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY,
Middletown, Conn., July 2, 1886.

Mr. VEST. I did not have that read in order to go into a discussion of the question whether oleomargarine be a healthy food or not. I simply want to show that there is an honest difference of opinion about it; but if this be the most deleterious and unhealthy compound ever invented by mortal man either for greed or malice, we have nothing to do with it. Unless we can satisfy ourselves that we are legitimately exercising the taxing power in this case, we have nothing to do with the question of the health or the deleterious nature of this much-abused product. If frauds be perpetrated upon the citizens of the United States by inducing them to eat this oleomargarine when they suppose they are eating dairy butter, when it is marked and branded falsely as butter, that is within the cognizance of the States alone. The Supreme Court of the United States has so decided in an unbroken chain of authorities from Gibbons vs. Ogden, decided by Chief-Justice Marshall in 9 Wheaton, down to the term before last of the Supreme Court.

I have taken the trouble to collate these authorities, and I assert now that in Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wallace, in 7 Wallace, in 11 Wallace, in 16 Wallace again, in 92 United States, in 97 United States, in 5 Wallace, in 9 Wallace, and in 97 United States the Supreme Court through different judges has over and over again in one unbroken line of authorities declared that health, quarantine, and inspection laws were given by the Constitution to the States alone. Chief-Justice Marshall said, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, speaking of inspection laws:

> They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government and which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating internal commerce of a State and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

Mr. President, to make this thing so clear to a lawyer that there can be no mistake about it, in the case of Patterson vs. The State of Kentucky, where the opinion was a unanimous one and delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan, the facts were these: Patterson brought into the State of Kentucky, as he had a right to do, an oil called "Aurora Illuminating Oil," and it was held by a Kentucky court that the sale of it inside of the State was in violation of a Kentucky statute, and he was fined $250. He had a patent for this oil, and he came to the Supreme Court of the United States claiming that his patent gave him the right to sell the oil anywhere within the domain of the General Government, ignoring the police power of the States, ignoring the fundamental legal axiom that a citizen has a right to take any product of one State to another and that State into which it is carried can not prohibit its importation, yet if he undertakes to sell that product within the territorial limits of the State he becomes subject immediately to its police power. I may take any of my property from the State of Missouri to the State of Illinois, but the very minute that my foot presses the soil of Illinois the police power of that State attaches to me and to my property; and if this were not so the State would be destroyed absolutely and without the right to protect its own citizens. Said Judge Harlan, in delivering this opinion:

> It is not to be supposed that Congress intended to authorize or regulate the sale within a State of tangible personal property which that State declares to be unfit and unsafe for use, and by statute has prohibited from being sold or offered for sale within her limits. It was held by Chief-Justice Shaw to be a settled principle, "growing out of the nature of well-ordered society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community." (Commonwealth vs. Alger, 7 Cush., (Mass.) 53.) In recognition of this fundamental principle we have frequently decided that the police power of the States was not surrendered when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States.

It is claimed here by the advocates of this bill that this police power is within the authority of Congress to regulate commerce between the States. The Supreme Court answers that identical proposition and says:

> Hence the States may, by police regulations, protect their people against the introduction within their respective limits of infected merchandise. "A bale of goods upon which the duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under health laws, and if it can not be purged of its poison may be committed to the flames." (Gilman vs. Philadelphia, supra.) So may the States, by like regulations, exclude from their midst not only convicts, paupers, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, but animals having contagious diseases. (Railroad Company vs. Husen, supra.) This court has never hesitated, by the most rigid rules of construction, to guard the commercial power of Congress against encroachment in the form or under the guise of State regulation, established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution. It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity, recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding State police regulations which were enacted in good faith, and has appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each State owes to her citizens.
> These considerations, gathered from the former decisions of this court, would seem to justify the conclusion that the right which the patentee or his assignee possesses in the property created by the application of a patented discovery must be enjoyed subject to the complete and salutary power with which the States have never parted, of so defining and regulating the sale and use of property within their respective limits as to afford protection to the many against the injurious conduct of the few. The right of property in the physical substance, which is the fruit of the discovery, is altogether distinct from the right in the discovery itself, just as the property in the instruments or plate by which copies of a map are multiplied is distinct from the copyright of the map itself.

If my strength permitted I could stand here and read by the hour a line of unbroken decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States that the police power is prohibited to Congress within the respective States and given to the States alone. I have searched thoroughly from the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden down to the last term of the Supreme Court, and there is not a dissent. I say that the assumption here in this debate that the Government of the United States can go into any State and interfere with its internal domestic police regulations is the most monstrous political heresy that ever was announced in the American Senate. It is an absolute and utter abrogation of all the limitations of the Constitution and of the construction put by the highest judicial tribunal of the land upon that instrument.

It is worse than the most extreme federalism that Alexander Hamilton ever taught in the whole of his extraordinary career. It is the essence of centralization. If the General Government can, under the guise of exercising the revenue power, interfere to prevent a fraud, no matter how glaring that fraud may be, if the Congress of the United States can go into any State of the Union and usurp the functions of the State authorities, and set that State with all its power aside until its purposes are carried out, what is left of the States? With my whole heart and soul I denounce any such assumption. The Constitution never intended that Congress should act as a police instrumentality; and to say that the power to regulate commerce among the States carries with it any lawful police power is just as monstrous as the naked and bald annunciation of the doctrine itself in all its enormity.

Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to notice one or two assumptions that are made by the advocates of this bill. This power is claimed under the general-welfare clause, claimed under the power to regulate commerce between the States, and at last it is claimed upon the broad ground that it is the duty of Congress to legislate for the benefit of the people at large in this country. I can have no argument with any Senator who makes that assumption, because he ignores the written limitations of the Constitution and says that Congress can do all that it wishes to do without let or hinderance.

I know, Mr. President, as we have been told so often by the advocates of this bill, that there is an enormous influence behind this legislation which public men must beware of. I know how easy it is to array the prejudices of a great class like the farmers of the country, especially when supplemented to that bill is the denunciation of the monopolies and the great gigantic capitalists of the country. I have no acquaintance even with a manufacturer of oleomargarine. I represent one of the largest agricultural States of this Union, but neither the agricultural interests nor any other interests can induce me to trample upon the principles of the Constitution and to violate my oath to support it. And if I should condescend to notice such appeals as that, I have one other thing to say.

Great as is the dairy interest of this country, there is another interest even greater than that, putting aside our obligations to support the Constitution. I want Senators to understand that the laboring and poorer classes of this country understand full well what this means when you tell them that they shall not buy what they please, that they shall not purchase oleomargarine at 12 or 14 cents a pound, but must go and buy dairy butter at 25 or 30 or 40 cents a pound. Why, sir, we see all over the country immense fortunes made by selling this dairy product, not by the farmer, but the city dealer. Mr. Armour says that his best customers are the dairymen. He says his largest trade in butterine comes from the gentlemen who are engaged in the sales of pure Alderney dairy butter!

But there are interests in the country besides this dairy interest. It is asserted by the cattle-men—and the cattle interest is the largest interest west of the Mississippi River—that the passage of this bill will decrease the value of every head of beef-cattle from two to three dollars at the lowest estimate. In my own State alone we have one million six hundred and forty thousand beef-cattle; and take off $1 even from each one of these animals and you can easily see the enormous loss that falls on this interest alone.

The cattle-men of the country have been compelled to meet with the assertion of their own interest the advocacy of this bill. I have here a letter addressed to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], which I ask the Secretary to read. This comes from a gentleman interested in cattle, and the statement I make here I derive from a committee of cattlemen who called upon my colleague and myself, representing the large cattle interest in Missouri, and who simply ask us not to pass a law in the interest of the dairy people which strikes down the value of their property, and they have a right to ask it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: I notice that the oleomargarine bill, having passed the House, has now been reported to the Senate without amendment. The general expectation seems to be that your honorable body will adopt it also with the idea of placing the responsibility on the President if he should see fit to veto it. There is no justice or right in this oleomargarine measure, and the Senate of the United States should never permit it to reach the President for his signature.

Let me call your attention to a few facts regarding the bill: In the first place the bill is alleged to provide for a tax upon oleomargarine, when in fact it calls for a tax upon all the cattle raised in the United States. It ostensibly cuts down the profits upon the manufacture of oleomargarine, but in fact cuts down the selling price of every steer raised in this country. The tax of 5 cents per pound upon oleomargarine, as provided for in this bill, would not place one penny into the pockets of the dairymen of the country, but it would take $2 per head off the market price of every steer raised in the American Union, and I will tell you why: The heaviest makers of oleomargarine in the United States are also the heaviest buyers of cattle in the United States. I refer to the three great firms comprising the dressed-beef monopoly of the Union Stock Yards of Chicago. An interested people know this trinity of dressed-beef, cattle-buying monopolists have thrived and waxed fat financially by reason of cut rates and rebates upon railroads running to the seaboard. One of them, having at his back the Grand Trunk road of Canada, has been enabled to slaughter one-third of all the fat cattle arriving in Chicago; the others of the trinity are given similar advantages by roads leading to the same Eastern markets, but ruled by managers who believe in underhand and sub rosa rebates. The result is that these few makers of oleomargarine and buyers of cattle hold within their iron grip this, the greatest cattle market in the world, and are in a position to pay the farmer for his cattle whatever price may best please their sweet monopolistic wills.

Now, in case this bill is passed these makers of oleomargarine will have to pay a tax of 5 cents per pound on every pound they make. How will they get even? By simply paying the farmer and cattle-raiser just $2 less per steer for every steer brought to this great Union Stock Yards cattle market—a market which makes the price for all cattle markets throughout the Union. Mr. Senator, will this state of things help the farmer or cattle producer? Most certainly not. Will it help the dairymen? Let us see. There is much more neutral lard than tallow used in this country in the manufacture of butter; all dairymen use neutral lard in greater or less quantities in butter making. Our finest creamery butter receives its share of neutral lard. Indeed, where one pound of tallow is used in the making of butter at least four pounds of neutral lard are used. This being the case, why tax the steer, as, in plain English, this bill will do and let the hog go free.

Oleomargarine is largely exported and is not so generally used in this country as neutral lard. Another thing, the placing of this tax upon oleomargarine will not stop in the least its manufacture. The tallow from the steer must be used in some direction, and as the great production of petroleum in this country has caused that product to almost wholly replace tallow as a lubricator, and in other channels, the only opening left for its use is in the manufacture of oleomargarine. Even with a 5-cent tax the cheapness of tallow would still permit the large manufacture of oleomargarine. Nothing less than a 15-cent tax would benefit the dairymen in the least, and in case a 15-cent tax was imposed it would fall, as I have shown, upon the cattle-raiser, and not upon the maker of oleomargarine. The bill you are about to pass, in the very best light you can place it, is a tax upon one of the great industries in the West—cattle-raising—to benefit a large Eastern interest—the dairymen. It is not against common honesty to tax one great agricultural interest in favor of one no less important, but fathered, perhaps, and protected by a larger representation in the Congress of the Union.

Respectfully,

S. W. ALLERTON.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, putting it in the most conservative shape, I decline to exercise what every Senator must admit to be a doubtful constitutional power in order to strike down one interest for another; I will never give any vote which discriminates between one interest and one class of producers in favor of another, for it is to use the Government for private and not for public purposes. Statesmanship, honesty, my oath to support the Constitution as an individual Senator forbid. The laws of the United States should apply alike for the protection of all its people in all the parts of this great Union. Let them be free to apply their own industry, free to follow their own inclinations, provided those inclinations and pursuits do not militate with the just rights of others.

If I vote for this bill I subvert the fundamental principles of free government and use the machinery of Government out of the sphere where the Constitution has placed it in order to forward and advance the interests of one set of producers at the expense of another. If the advance in invention, in machinery, in the wish and aim to meet the increasing wants of civilization result in the discovery of a new food product, it is my duty as a legislator to protect that industry and that product as far as I can. If fraud is committed under it the States are the only instrumentalities that can take charge of those frauds and punish and prevent them.

The State of Missouri in 1881 passed a law virtually prohibiting the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine within its limits, and that law has been three times amended, but the miserable argument and illogical sequence is put before me that the State has not the machinery to enforce its own laws. What is the result of that doctrine? It is to teach the American citizen to look away from his State government, as the Senator from Vermont has said here over again, from the State authorities to the Congress of the United States and beg protection from them. The whole result, not of that argument, for it is no argument, of that appeal is to teach the people of the United States that their State governments are powerless for good and that Congress alone can protect their persons, their property, and their constitutional rights. I shall not be a party to any such teachings. When the States can not protect their people with their own police power, this Government as a free Government has ended, and the imperial centralized system has taken the place of constitutional limitations which our fathers intended to establish.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pause a moment the Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House requested the Senate to furnish the House of Representatives an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1042) to pay B. S. James for transporting the United States mails.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 89) providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BARKSDALE, Mr. REID of North Carolina, and Mr. FARQUHAR the managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the year 1885; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the following resolutions of the Senate:

A resolution for the printing of 4,500 additional copies of the report of the Academy of Sciences for the year 1885;

A resolution to print 3,000 extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the year ending June 30, 1885; and

A resolution to print 26,000 copies of the third annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 9798) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 22) authorizing the preparation of a compilation of the reports of committees of the Senate and House of Representatives; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause 15,000 copies of the map of the United States and Territories to be printed.

MINT REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the year 1885 be printed, and that 6,000 extra copies be printed; 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

B. S. JAMES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following request of the House of Representatives:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish the House of Representatives an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1042) to pay B. S. James for transporting the United States mails.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the request of the House be granted?

The request was granted.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, is not that an unusual request from the House, that the Senate be requested to furnish them with a copy of an engrossed bill? I should like to have that resolution read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read. The Chair understands the engrossed bill was lost.

The Chief Clerk read the request of the House of Representatives, as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish the House of Representatives an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1042) to pay B. S. James for transporting the United States mails.

Mr. PLATT. The engrossed bill furnished has been lost by the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair is advised. That is the allegation in the House.

Mr. PLATT. Then I have no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 22) authorizing the preparation of a compilation of the reports of committees of the Senate and House of Representatives; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause 15,000 copies of the map of the United States and Territories to be printed.

The bill (H. R. 9798) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BUTTER AND OLEOMARGARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I should probably not have trespassed even for a few minutes on the time of the Senate except for the allusion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to suggestions made by myself at the time this bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture which might have placed me in a wrong position as to what I assumed in regard to this matter.

There seems to be but little difference on both sides of the Chamber, or rather between the friends and opponents of the bill, as to general principles; but the difficulty is as to the state of fact, and then as to the application of principles thereto.

There is no attempt made by this legislation to trespass on the police regulations or laws of any State, and hence when the Senator from Missouri was reading the last decision which he read, that a State might prohibit the introduction of goods infected with disease, I should like to have propounded a question to him. If on the Atlantic seaboard in different ports goods were lying, upon which duties had been paid, which were infected with the germs of disease, and Congress knew that fact, and there might or might not in the different States of this Union be laws prohibiting the introduction of goods of that nature, I ask him if he believes it would not be within the power of Congress to provide that goods of that character should not be introduced into any of the States of this Union? Does he believe Congress has no power to do an act of that kind, whether there may or may not be a law of the State on the subject?

So to announce general principles is one thing and the application of general principles is quite another. My friend from Missouri says we are seeking to protect one industry at the expense of another. I beg leave to say that that is a statement of fact upon which there is not an agreement. When he says we ought not to protect one industry at the expense of another, I agree with him. I stand as firmly and as broadly upon that proposition as the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator; but that is not this case. The question is whether one honest industry shall be protected against the fraud of another industry. That is the question—not to tear down one to build up another. That is not the point.

Before there was any legislation proposed in Congress on this matter men who are engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine were perpetrating what, I trust I may be allowed to say, is a fraud, a pretense upon the people of the United States. One of the greatest manufacturers of oleomargarine is the firm of Armour & Co., in Chicago. No one, I suppose, will question their honesty or integrity; and so what I say of them will not be taken as meant in an offensive way or as a reflection on them. Whatever this manufacture may be—you may call it a fraud or whatever it may be—it is an imposition upon the people to manufacture one product of honest industry and then palm it off upon the people and upon commerce as another. Shall that be protected? That is the point; not striking down one industry to build up another, but, as I have suggested, protecting one industry, if you please, from the injustice of another.

Why is oleomargarine put up in the shape of butter if it is not intended to deceive? Before there was any bill introduced into Congress Messrs. Armour & Co. came here and they now come and tell us they brand their goods, they label them so that nobody can be deceived, and yet the very brand which they make and put upon this production shows an intention to deceive. Here is their own brand [exhibiting]: "Armour & Co., Pure Dairy Butterine." Why "dairy?" Will somebody tell me why put in "dairy" if not intended to deceive? "Pure dairy butterine." Then another brand they have. If they can get on the racket of that, as the boys would say, they have another brand: "Armour & Co., Finest Creamery Butterine." Why "creamery?"

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will permit me to suggest that I think he was present in the committee at the time Mr. Webster produced that brand and said to the committee that, at the request of a customer, they would leave off "butterine" and "oleomargarine" entirely and put on any fancy name as "Oakfield Creamery" or anything else anybody might want.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Exactly. That was being done before any bill was introduced into either House of Congress. Gentlemen say they have a right to make oleomargarine or butterine. Certainly they have; and if it had been kept as oleomargarine and butterine and so had been placed on the market the first word probably never would have been uttered in the legislation of Congress on the subject.

This oleomargarine you say is a legitimate product. Certainly. Then sell it as a legitimate product; but when you brand it as something else, the intention is to deceive and to impose a fraud upon the commerce and upon the people of the country and nothing else. There is the fact, and that fact will answer all the theories that may be started. No matter about State rights. That has nothing to do with it. No matter about the Constitution that is brought in on every convenient occasion—no matter about that. Here is the point. Here is a legitimate product branded as a fraud. What then? Then they say police regulations. Certainly. Your State of Kentucky may have a regulation in regard to the danger of burning-fluid and provide against it; your State may have a law providing against the introduction of goods infected with disease. Certainly, if Congress should assume, in violation of your State law, to insist that inflammable material should be sold in your State, if Congress should undertake to assume that goods infected might be sold in your State in violation of your statute, then we could understand the decision. But here Congress is only doing what by the Constitution it is authorized to do, regulating commerce between the States. What is commerce? It is too late in the day to discuss that. This is a branch of it. Transporting cattle alive from Chicago to New York is commerce. That is conceded. Transporting cattle dead is commerce. Transporting a production made from cattle, oleomargarine, branded as it is with a falsehood, is commerce, and the power to regulate that seems to me to be the beginning and ending of this matter.

When gentlemen speak of this production being legitimate, I agree with them as far as the facts will excuse it; but look at this brand of the manufacturers, the great producers of this production, and they brand a falsehood upon it and set it afloat through the channels of commerce to wend its way from Chicago to New York and other portions of the country.

Mr. President, I doubt very much whether the passage of this bill will be as much in the way of suppression as is supposed by some. I hope it will. Mr. Armour buys cattle cheap. Mr. Armour doctors his goods, brands them, and the object of that is what? That the price of these goods may reach in the market the price of genuine butter. Is not that what he does it for? The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] a few days ago said Michigan butter was 8 to 10 cents a pound. Gentleman go farther west, and find it selling for 6 or 8 cents a pound. Absolutely pure butter in some parts of the United States is selling for less than this manufactured article branded as it is. I doubt very much whether the passage of the bill will raise the price of butter, probably not much more than it will affect the price of milk. Milk has access to the market which my friend refers to; and yet that industry is depressed in New York.

There is fraud in all these pursuits. If they could manage to wring the water out of the milk, undoubtedly milk could be profitably produced, and so if we could manage to get the grease out of butter as well as the water out of the milk. Fraud exists everywhere. That is the misfortune at this time, and the question is how to reach it. We think we can reach it. There is no reason why we should not do it.

I wanted to make myself right on the question of the power which the Senator from Missouri says we are seeking to exercise of protecting one industry to the injury of another. This power has been frequently exercised to prevent and regulate adulterations. We have done it in the case of medicines. We have done it in the case of whisky. Congress has done it, you may say, for a different reason, but yet it has been done. The power of protecting one industry at the expense of another is not assumed by this bill, but it is, as I have stated, to prevent one industry from defrauding another.

This oleomargarine has been assuming the guise and fraudulently masquerading in the color of butter. Oleomargarine is white; that is, the natural product of the legitimate industry; but it is in the guise of butter in color and then in flavor, though the original production has neither the color nor flavor of butter. When that is all done as far as they can do it, they give it the name and brand it "dairy" and brand it "creamery." This bill is only to restrict that and compel it to stand on its own merits, and Congress deems this the best way to accomplish that object. It is a matter of commerce. Adulterations are made, and that subject is within the power of Congress.

On one branch of that point I find right here in the District of Columbia that Congress passed a law that flour should be inspected. True, it was restricted to the District of Columbia; but there are two branches to the argument against this bill. First is it the duty of the Government to undertake to regulate a legitimate industry, and next is it a constitutional exercise of power? As to the first, Congress has legislated in the District of Columbia that flour shall be inspected and that a tax shall be imposed on every barrel of flour to pay for its inspection. Congress has exercised that power of controlling a legitimate industry by requiring right here under the shadow of the Capitol that every barrel of flour shall be inspected by an inspector who shall after he has inspected it brand it. You may ask what right is there to brand any goods in the market the product of a legitimate industry, and then if any man shall sell them without their being inspected and branded he is to pay a fine of a dollar a barrel. There is a tax on a barrel of flour. That answers one point as to the absurdity of taxing an industry.

Now Congress desires to reach this other matter, because the very promoters of it have made it necessary that Congress shall reach it. How shall they do it? I desire to say now and here for myself that whatever is imposed is not to raise money to put in the Treasury. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that we do not need it. We have money enough in the Treasury. It is not for that purpose, and it is not to build up one industry to the injury of another; but the best way to provide against a fraud is to regulate the manufacture of the article, and then we can protect commerce and protect the people from using it. It is said people use this because it is cheap, that poor men use it only because it is cheap. Are they benefited by the manufacturers of this thing branding it as butter and obtaining the price of butter for it?

Congress undertakes to say "We will deal with this question as a matter of commerce," and how shall we deal with it? We provide this machinery for its inspection, for its examination, and in order to pay the expense of this machinery we put a tax upon the article. The manufacturers of it have rendered it necessary by the frauds they resort to to impose upon commerce, and therefore all that Congress does is to place a tax upon it sufficient to defray the expense of its inspection. If there is more received than is necessary, Congress can relieve by reducing the amount.

The Senator from New York says very properly that Mr. Webster said they branded this according to the wants of the people. I read from his examination before the Committee on Agriculture:

The CHAIRMAN. Do not all the manufacturers in branding it leave out the words "oleomargarine" and "butterine," and simply brand it "dairy" or "creamery?"

Mr. WEBSTER. Possibly so. Sometimes they put on a single name without specifying whether it is dairy or creamery.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that?

Mr. WEBSTER. Sometimes they will put on the name with the word "oleomargarine" under it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does your house ever brand it without using the words "butterine" or "oleomargarine?"

What? You say it is a legitimate article of commerce!

Mr. WEBSTER. Yes; but not to any great extent. We do that on an order, because customers ask it.

Why do they ask it? What is the objection to this article being branded as it is, and showing just what it is? Here one of the great manufacturers, a firm without reproach, states these facts, and they show sufficient in them to induce Congress to interpose and protect commerce, and to protect honest and fair dealing, and if they have rendered it necessary that something shall be done, Congress must determine what that shall be, and they have determined to deal with it as commerce, and in order to furnish the machinery they put this tax on that article and declare that this much shall be done for protection.

My friend says that west of the Mississippi River they are interested in raising cattle. Certainly I partake of that feeling with my friend from Missouri, but I desire to say to him that whether some of the suet is made into oleomargarine and butterine or not has not a feather's weight in the price of the cattle. It is the great commerce, it is the great market which gives the value—the price in the market. There are only about thirty establishments engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine. There are only a few localities in the United States where it is made. Do you pretend that Mr. Armour and these men are those who fix the price of cattle? No; in a thousand other places they buy this beef for food and can only use it for food, and there you get the market price.

Do Mr. Armour and the thirty other manufacturers of oleomargarine by their purchases settle the price of cattle? Do they make the cattle more valuable by converting a portion of the animals into this article and then branding it fraudulently, thereby getting a higher price for it? Do Mr. Armour and the other thirty manufacturers raise the price of beef one penny a pound? I can not believe it and I think dealers generally do not believe it, because there are thousands of others who buy and slaughter cattle. The price must be regulated by the great mass of purchasers and the great consumption of the article.

While I agree to much that has been said by the opponents of the bill as to matters of principle, I only rose to explain how these principles do not apply, and that the power Congress is seeking to apply is not of a doubtful character and is not only proper in itself but a judicious application of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long.

Congress since the foundation of the Government has taken a good many liberties with the Constitution. There have been times in its history when it confessedly camped outside of the Constitution. Very prominent statesmen have denounced the Constitution as "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." True, that charge was made in times of great excitement, immediately on the heels of a gigantic civil war, before the passions of the people had subsided, and therefore may be partially excused on that ground. But, sir, I had hoped that there was reverence enough for that instrument to have saved it from the assaults which we now see being made upon it.

The Senator from Nebraska who has just taken his seat [Mr. VAN WYCK] sneered at those who chose to rely upon the Constitution for their guidance as "hiding behind the Constitution," and said in terms, almost, that the Constitution was not in his way, he would brush that aside, and he would pass this act without regard to its provisions or limitations or restraints.

Why, Mr. President, it is painful in this forum at least to hear language like that from a distinguished Senator from a sovereign State. Throw the Constitution aside as something unworthy to be considered, and allow Congress or a majority of it in its own sweet will to do whatever it thinks right; ignore the Supreme Court of the United States; ignore precedent, trample upon the fundamental principles of the Government, and establish upon the ruins an unbridled parliamentary government to do as it pleases. That, sir, is the position; and of all the violations that have been shown to it, I submit that this bill, in my judgment, is the most flagrant, unblushing disregard of the principles of the Constitution that has ever been introduced into the Congress of the United States.

It is not pretended by the advocates of this bill that the purpose is to raise revenue, and I submit to any constitutional lawyer upon this floor or elsewhere that that, and that alone, is allowed by the Constitution. Why, sir, we are not permitted under our consciences to accomplish by indirectness that which we have not the power to accomplish directly. We surely shall not attempt to usurp the reserved powers of the States in the regulation of their police affairs or their quarantine affairs by using the taxing power to suppress them and blot them out of existence. That is in effect what this bill proposes to do.

I shall not attempt to go over again the arguments which have been so ably presented by the Senators who have preceded in opposition to this bill in the constitutional or legal aspect of the question; but I will put my objections solely on the ground that it is in itself not only unwise legislation, but that it is unjust and is in itself a fraud.

We have heard a good deal on the subject of fraud to-day, fraudulent oleomargarine, butterine, and various frauds. I confess that I have no accurate knowledge upon that subject. I doubt very much if I would recognize oleomargarine when I saw it or tasted it. I know nobody who manufactures it or sells it. I have never heard, it has never been asserted upon this floor, that it is not a perfectly legitimate industry, that any citizen of the country may not manufacture oleomargarine if he pleases; but the gravamen of the complaint is that after he manufactures it he does not label it "oleomargarine," and that seems to me to be about all that is complained of. Now, if it be true that it is healthful, that it is what it purports to be, I submit that Congress has no power under the Constitution, or, as I said a while ago, in the exercise of its own conscience, to suppress it in the interest of another industry.

I have said that this bill itself was a fraud, and I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee would explain to me and to the Senate the meaning of the first section, for perhaps he is more familiar with the manufacture of dairy butter than myself. The very first section is:

That for the purposes of this act the word "butter" shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter.

I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee would explain to me why that reservation was put into the first section of this bill if it was not to enable the so-called dairymen to perpetrate a fraud upon the people of this country. Will any honest man who makes butter find it necessary to put coloring matter into it unless he intends to perpetrate a fraud upon the consumer of that product, and if he does not intend to perpetrate a fraud why give him the right by act of Congress purporting to suppress a fraud? Why give him the power and the right under the law to perpetrate a fraud himself?

Mr. MILLER. What is the fraud?

Mr. BUTLER. "With or without additional coloring matter."

Mr. MILLER. The Senator ought to know that in the manufacture of the dairy in the ordinary process from the milk of the cow coloring matter has been used from time immemorial.

Mr. BUTLER. Coloring matter? Why, will the Senator inform me? Why use coloring matter? A great deal has been said about the fraud of oleomargarine. If the dairyman is honest and is going to give to the consumer what he claims to make, why put coloring matter in it? Why interfere with the laws of nature, and take the natural product of the cow and put coloring matter into it? What coloring matter? Has anybody vouchsafed to tell us what that coloring matter is, whether it is wholesome or unwholesome?

Mr. MILLER. I assume, of course, that the Senator is familiar enough with the manufacture of the dairy in the old-fashioned way to know what the coloring matter used is.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not.

Mr. MILLER. It is perfectly wholesome. It is always a vegetable matter, and it is what is called annotto.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. MILLER. It undoubtedly has been used for a great many years, how many years I do not know. But it is well known to the dairymen that the different kinds of foods given to a cow will produce some difference in the color of the butter, and in order that the manufacture may have a uniform color from one end of the year to the other the coloring matter contained in annotto is used, and has been from time immemorial. It is perfectly harmless, and has always been so declared.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the object of putting in that coloring matter?

Mr. MILLER. I have just explained that by stating that different kinds of food to cows produces butter of different degrees of color, the natural ordinary color being light yellow, cream color. That is where we get the term "cream color," from cream; and some kinds of food produce a lighter or less yellow color than others; and in order that it may be all of one uniform color it is customary to color butter in the dairy. It has been done, as I stated before, from time immemorial.

Mr. BUTLER. The object of the coloring matter is evidently intended for the purpose of practicing a fraud upon the consumer.

Mr. MILLER. How a fraud?

Mr. BUTLER. Why put it in?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from South Carolina really desires information upon that subject, and will permit the interruption, I have a vial of what is commonly known as butter coloring here in the original package, with the instructions for use on the chromatic envelope, and a statement of the purpose for which it is employed. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but if he will consent——

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. INGALLS. I will present the facts as they appear.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be very glad to hear, for I really want information.

Mr. INGALLS. I hold in my hand a vial of "Wells, Richardson & Co.'s Perfected Butter Color," which, the envelope assures us, "gives to white butter a beautiful dandelion color; price 25 cents," and, as a commentary on the suggestions made by the Senator from Vermont this afternoon that this bill was intended to prevent one man from cheating another, I will state that this preparation pretends to be manufactured by "Wells, Richardson & Co., Prop's, Burlington, Vermont." [Laughter.]

Open this end.
Keep the bottle
in this box at all times to protect from
action of the light—

says the label. This vial, so the manufacturers assure us, put up in Burlington, Vt. [laughter], for dairy purposes is—

winter butter.

In using our Perfected Butter Color it must be borne in mind that no two dairies will often require the same amount of color. Cows fed on poor hay, and kept with only ordinary care, will make whiter butter than when well cared for and fed on fine hay and grain; also young cows give less color than old.

Different seasons also make much difference. Care should be taken—to get just the right amount, and never overcolor.

Say these friends of the dairymen—

Coloring butter nicely is an art, and one must expect to learn something by practice and experience.

CAUTION!

In large letters and with an interjection point after it—

This preparation is made by a process entirely new and original with us. No other process can produce so pure and harmless nor so uniform and reliable a color, and consumers should be careful to use only the genuine, which is always put up in bottles, and each bottle in a box bearing our dandelion trade-mark. Beware of preparations sold in bulk or under similar names, for you will find them but poor imitations.

This is somewhat protracted, but the advice to the dairymen of America is so important and they have been presented in the light of a long-suffering class of afflicted people engaged in their bucolic honesty in Vermont and elsewhere in a struggle with the herculean efforts of the manufacturers of oleomargarine to put a spurious article on the market, that I feel that perhaps the Senate will bear with me, and the Senator from South Carolina also, while I continue to give the country information as to the methods in which butter-color is prepared and the purposes for which it is employed.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be delighted.

Mr. INGALLS—

We take pleasure in offering to the dairymen of America—

Not to the oleomargarine men—

this preparation as the perfect result of our long-continued experiments in the preparation of an artificial color for their use. In our Perfected Butter Color we have succeeded in combining the same bright yellow coloring principle found in the dandelion blossom with our previously well-known "Golden Extract"—

Now notice this—thereby securing a bright golden tint so exactly like the highest grade of Jersey butter that no expert can detect it [laughter], even by actual comparison of the artificial color with the natural.

We claim for it every point wanted in a perfect butter-color, namely:

First. Perfect color. The butter never turns to a reddish tinge, but always keeps the bright golden color.

Second. Perfect freedom from any taste or smell that can be imparted to the butter.

Third. Perfect keeping qualities. It does not mold, sour, or spoil in any way. Heat or cold have no effect on it.

It is apparently one of the unchangeable elements of nature—

It has a decided tendency to preserve butter, whereas butter colored with carrots, annatto, &c., will often spoil—

Notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from New York, who is supposed to be an expert in these matters—will often spoil or turn to a dull reddish tint.

Fourth—

And here comes the nut of this whole matter. The Senate is now about to learn why this butter-color is used, the purpose for which it is employed, the reasons why it is put onto the market, and why these innocent, unsophisticated countrymen in the valleys of the streams of New England that have no knowledge whatever of the plumber, whose products have become synonymous with purity and excellence—why it is that manufactories turn out barrels of butter-color, and why it is, as the Senator from New York says from time immemorial, so long that the memory of man runneth not back to the contrary, the innocent dairyman has colored his butter.

FOURTH.—PERFECT ECONOMY IN USE.

It requires no labor, as it is a fluid that is put in with the cream in the churn. It is cheaper than any other coloring, being put up in three sizes, selling at 25 cents, 50 cents, and $1 each, which color, respectively, 300, 750, and 2,000 pounds of butter.

I almost hesitate to read the last paragraph:

We warrant it to add at least 5 cents per pound to the value of white butter, a return of $1 for every cent it costs.

This is the preparation, Mr. President [exhibiting a vial]. It looks like tincture of iodine. It is manufactured in Burlington, Vt. [laughter] by Wells, Richardson & Co. for the use of dairymen, and is warranted to add 5 cents a pound to every pound of white butter they make in the winter time, or from the milk of cows that are fed on poor hay and cheap food, and to give to the butter manufactured from the Texas stock, or the poor cows that wander on those rocky hill-sides, a color that will prevent even the most astute expert from being able to detect it from the "highest grade of Jersey butter."

I may add that this auxiliary of the dairy came into my possession in rather a peculiar way. We had a bill before the Committee on the District of Columbia for preventing the sale and adulteration of foods, and a gentleman who carries on a small dairy in the suburbs here with a few cows came to the committee-room one morning and said that he was brought into competition with the proprietors of Alderney and Jersey dairies in this city in a way that rendered it impossible for him to continue his business, and he said that there was a preparation sold in the market, kept in all the drug stores, manufactured in Burlington, Vt., and that the use of a single drop of it in a quart of skimmed milk would change it into the appearance of the finest Alderney beverage with the cream in it, and that some of these great dairymen in the vicinity here, who furnish Alderney milk of the highest grade and the most opulent description, gathered in from everywhere the products, skimmed milk, low-grade milk, and in the cans and vats and tanks and reservoirs of their laboratory poured in a drop or teaspoonful of this product and, presto, it was changed into the richest product of the dairy; and he performed the experiment before me in my presence. He had with him a can of genuine milk from his own dairy with the cream in it and he had a can of the most watery and cerulean material, I suppose, that ever went by the name of milk. He took two goblets and into one he poured the milk with the cream in it and into the other this skimmed material, and out of this vial he put one single drop into the goblet of skimmed milk, and it became, so far as the eye or the appearance was concerned, in every particular equal to the other; and he stated that the innocent dairymen, who now desire to be protected against fraud, who are struggling to furnish the people of this city and elsewhere with pure products, and who are inflamed against tallow and lard and the other products of the same animal, were engaged in using this same material for the purpose habitually of imposing upon their customers and obtaining inordinate prices for their product.

The usual method—

Say Wells, Richardson & Co., of Burlington, Vt., for using "perfected butter color"— is to add the color to the cream in the churn. The rule is one teaspoonful for four gallons of cream, but the amount may have to be varied somewhat according to circumstances, as stated on the outside of the box. This method is the simplest and easiest and gives good satisfaction. The objections are that the buttermilk is slightly colored, and the shade of color will be somewhat injured by contact with sour cream, especially if it is quite acid. The method which we consider to give the best color to the butter is the following: The buttermilk must first be all washed or worked out. Then mix the color with sufficient powdered white sugar to absorb it and make a paste; spread the butter out thin and spread the colored sugar over it; work it in partially and then add the salt and work as usual. This is the method employed by some of our most expert butter-makers, who get the best color and flavor.

Coloring butter nicely is an art, and one must expect to learn something by practice and experience. Our color will surely give you a beautiful June tint when properly used. Be careful not to use too much of the color, as a high color is not desirable in winter.

CAUTION.—The genuine will always bear the fac-simile of our signature, thus:

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO.

As I stated before, of Burlington, Vt.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. MILLER rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MILLER. I trust the Senator from South Carolina will yield to me a few moments, as he has yielded so much time to my distinguished friend here.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I am not sure whether this little tragedy which has been enacted upon this stage was all prearranged—"comedy" a friend suggests; I stand corrected—this burlesque was prearranged and rehearsed in the committee-room of the Committee on the District of Columbia or not, but certainly there seems to have been a perfect understanding between the two Senators, who quite likely have been sitting up of nights of late in order that they might produce this little play here to our delectation. Certainly I am very much obliged for it.

If the constituents of the Senator from Vermont are at all generous, if they have any gratitude for a kind act, they will make the distinguished Senator from Kansas rich for all time to come. This advertisement given to their goods could not be printed on as many pages and circulated as widely over this country for $50,000 in ready cash. He tells us how he came by it. I was thinking perhaps that some rosy-cheeked dairymaid of Vermont had come down here to give it to him and to tell him how good it was and to seek this indorsement here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I know nothing about this coloring matter which the distinguished Senator has dilated upon. When he was going over its wonderful character I was carried back to my boyhood days, when, at general trainings, I used to see a man standing in a wagon auctioning off bogus goods, bogus jewelry, offering to the people some elixir of life which would cure all the pains that flesh was heir to. Whether the Senator ever had any experience in that kind of work I do not know; but he has shown a great aptness for it here, and if he should ever fail in this calling, or any other, he certainly could succeed at that sort of work.

Mr. President, if he or any other Senator wants to decry the farmers and dairymen of this country, he may have a monopoly of that business. It is a well-known fact, and always has been known, that more or less coloring matter was used in the manufacture of butter, just as salt is used in its manufacture, and nobody has complained of it, and nobody has heretofore denounced it as a fraud. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas usually comes here with a flaming red necktie. Why color the natural silk? Why not wear it in the color that it came from the cocoon? Because he admires some other color. It is silk all the same; it is no fraud and no pretense whatever, I think. And that is true of everything we wear and of a great portion of the food that we eat. We find our cake sugared over and colored on the top with white sugar, or if we go back to our boyhood days we may remember when we rejoiced in yellow gingerbread, made yellow by New Orleans molasses and ginger. It was not the natural color of the flour, but if anybody had told us it was a fraud then, there would have been a contest on the spot. And, Mr. President, those of us who are not able to wear patent-leather shoes or fine kid boots usually set our shoes at the door at night to have them nicely blacked in the morning. Is there any fraud about that or any pretense of fraud?

Mr. President, there is nothing whatever in this bill to prevent the manufacturer of oleomargarine from coloring his oleomargarine any color he pleases—yellow, pink, black, or green; there is no pretense of any attempt to do that; and the scientific gentlemen who came before that committee when they were asked why the oleomargarine was colored, said it was colored to imitate butter because mankind having been accustomed to eat butter of a yellow tint would find that it was not so pleasant to eat oleomargarine if it was white as if it was yellow, and Dr. Chandler and Professor Morton, the two great authorities, insisted that it would be a great wrong upon mankind to prevent the coloring of oleomargarine yellow, that it would not be so pleasant to the taste or so sweet in the stomach if it were colored pink or green or red or any other color.

Mr. President, I do not think much can be made out of the charge that the dairymen have colored and do color their butter either by the natural process of feeding carrots to their cows or by putting an extract of annotto into it. It is well known that it is done, and I am surprised that the Senator from Kansas, knowing that he is a strong defender of this measure, one of its earliest advocates, should join hands with the Senator from South Carolina in this attack.

Mr. President, I send a document to the desk and ask to have it read, in order that we may know precisely the position of the distinguished Senator from Kansas on this question.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator to allow me a few moments after that is read.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to make a statement. I did not yield the floor to enable the Senator from New York to have letters printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER. Send it back and I will read it myself.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper will be read by the Secretary.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to the Secretary reading it.

Mr. MILLER. I did not intend to encroach on the time of the Senator from South Carolina, but as he yielded so much time to the Senator from Kansas I asked the same privilege, and supposed I had received it. I beg pardon if I have trespassed.

Mr. BUTLER. I certainly have been generous to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE RIGHT KIND OF TALK—A TRUE FRIND OF THE DAIRYMEN AND OF CORRECT PRINCIPLES.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., 4-20, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I am opposed to bogus butter as well as bogus politics, religion, and money, and shall do all I can to keep counterfeits out of circulation. The tax ought to be so heavy as to prevent the production and destroy the sale of the stuff you describe. It is surprising to me that a market can be found in Kansas. Perhaps the person who buys it, however, is equally guilty with him who sells.

Yours,

JOHN J. INGALLS.

To J. P. BADEN, Esq.,
Winfield, Kans.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the Senate will bear me witness that in the observations that I made I did not make any personal attack or make any personal allusion with reference to the Senator from New York. If any Senator thinks I did, I pause for a reply. Will any one say that I alluded to him in any particular, to his course, or his conduct, or his argument? I simply presented what I believed to be a legitimate argument in this matter, and the Senator from New York saw fit in his reply to descend into the arena of personality. His humor was very much like the attempt of a hippopotamus to dance on a slack rope [laughter], but of that I do not complain.

I pause now merely for the purpose of saying that I indorse every word that is contained in that letter which he has had read at the desk. I am opposed to bogus butter, whether it is made by a dairyman or an oleomargarine man. I do not know that ever I saw any oleomargarine. I have stood in the presence of confessedly genuine products of the dairy with awe and terror at their strength and with reverence for their antiquity. [laughter], and if there be anything worse even in the imagination of the Senator from New York than many of the products that have been placed within hailing distance of me in this city and elsewhere, to which my memory reverts with a shudder, all I have to say is that I should be in favor, if oleomargarine be worse, not only of a heavier tax on that, but of a prohibitory tax. But I have one thing further to say, Mr. President.

The Senator saw fit to allude to my youthful avocations, and presented the spectacle of a peddler at a country muster dealing in elixirs and selling compounds for the benefit of the populace. I have this remark to make in reply to that: Whatever I may have done, I never stood before the Senate of the United States advocating a measure in which I had the strongest personal interest, as the Senator from New York has. He is in the dairy business; he owns a dairy farm; he has a herd of dairy cattle; and he puts his products on the market in New York and elsewhere as the product of the Oak Hill or Oakleaf Creamery, and uses the whole power of his official station as a member of this body and as chairman of a committee to get this measure, in the first place, out of the committee where it belonged to his own, and then stands here on this floor day after day advocating a measure that is to increase directly the price of his own product.

Mr. President, as I said, I did not invite this controversy; I did not make any reference to the Senator from New York; but if he desires or thinks it advisable in a matter of this kind to pursue this subject upon personal grounds, he will find that I never decline the invitation. I say that a more shameful spectacle was never presented to the American people than this measure supported in the other House under the leadership of the chairman of a committee who is himself engaged in the dairy business, who has a herd and a farm whose product he sells in the market and upon which he relies for his support, and re-enforced in this body by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who is engaged in the same business, and who is to profit, if this bill can by any means whatever be passed through this body, directly by the legislation that he is seeking here to promote.

We have heard, Mr. President, something about attorneys at law in this body not being permitted to take fees against the Government of the United States in cases where land-grant railroads were involved; and the impropriety and the indecency of a member of this body availing himself of his position to take fees and swell his income as an attorney at law against the interests of the United States have been dwelt upon, and dwelt upon properly. But, sir, if that is improper, how much more improper is it, how much more indefensible is it, for the chairmen of the committees of the two Houses to present measures here in which they have direct personal interest, and whenever any argument is made against them to descend into the arena of vulgar personality and denunciation in order to make the passage of the measure less obnoxious.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. MILLER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York? ["Yes!" "Yes!"]

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I did not in my remarks, as the Senator says, refer to any calling of the Senator in his early life. The correct report of my words will not bear out the statement.

The Senator charges me with being directly interested in this measure. Mr. President, I am proud of the fact that I was born and reared on a farm. I am also proud of the fact that I now make my home upon a farm. It is true that I do for my own delectation keep a few cows, horses, and other domestic animals. It is true, sir, that I do at some periods of the year make butter upon that farm and other periods of the year cheese. I have expended, however, ten dollars in my experiments to improve butter and cheese and the products of the farm to every one that I have received in return; but I make no claim for that here and I seek no legislation to recompense me for my losses.

Mr. President, whether this bill passes or not, it adds not one farthing to any profit that I can possibly receive. Whatever butter is made upon my farm sells to-day for a price so high that it is in no way affected by the competition of oleomargarine or butterine or any other bogus stuff that may be put upon the market.

Shall it be said that no man having any material interest in this country shall hold a seat here to represent the industry or the class to which he belongs? I know that to-day three-quarters or more of all the national legislators are lawyers; but shall it be said, because a man happens to belong to the class of farmers or of manufacturers, that he can not here honestly represent the interests of the class to which he belongs even if he does have a few dollars of interest in that special industry? Mr. President, I think not; and I have no answer to make to the implication of the Senator from Kansas that I was actuated by base and corrupt motives in my support of this measure.

Sir, having been born and having lived among the dairy class all my life, seeing them to-day being driven out of their farms into bankruptcy and their farms going into the hands of the sheriff, I have felt called upon to raise my voice here in the national Legislature for their protection; and no sneers at the dairymen of this country, no implication that I am actuated by base and corrupt motives, will close my mouth here. I appeal from this infamous charge to my constituents through all the great rural districts of New York. I go for judgment to them and not to any man upon this floor who ventures to charge me with corruption.

Mr. President, those are words that neither the Senator from Kansas nor any other man dare to speak out of this body to me. Men here may shield and seek refuge behind the Constitution and behind parliamentary law; but I go to my constituents upon that base and infamous charge, and there I leave it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I had not the slightest idea of provoking this controversy between my two friends on the other side of the Chamber, I can assure them; and I do sincerely hope that when their angry passions have subsided they will think better of what has passed between them. I have nothing whatever to do with the personal issue between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New York. I was proceeding to discuss this bill in a perfectly legitimate parliamentary manner. I put a question to the Senator from New York which I think I had a right to propound to him. I asked him to explain why certain words were in the first section of the bill.

I believe I did say that the effect of this bill if it should become a law would be practically to legalize a fraud. I was not at all aware of the existence of the advertisement of the coloring matter to which the Senator from Kansas has referred, and if I was permitted to let my temper rise I might be disposed to say something pretty hard to the Senator from New York, but I will not. He was perhaps not conscious of the effect of his language when he charged that there must have been a conspiracy between the Senator from Kansas and myself, that we had rehearsed this tragedy. I hope it will not result in a tragedy.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator, I hope, knew that was a pleasantry.

Mr. BUTLER. I do sincerely hope it will not result in a tragedy. So far there have been a good many comic features in this debate, a good many things said in a Pickwickian sense which I have no doubt each one of the Senators will consider fully when he gets on the outside of the Chamber, which has been referred to.

So, Mr. President, I will not retort upon the Senator from New York in reply to that charge that I had formed a conspiracy with the Senator from Kansas. I desire to assure him that I had never heard before of this coloring matter from Burlington, Vt. I really was not aware of what the object of that provision of the bill was. I thought it was a little remarkable that a bill purporting to have for its object the suppression of a fraud should contain language which had the appearance of being a fraud itself.

But let that pass. Therefore I was, Mr. President, justified in saying that if this bill becomes a law it legalizis a fraud upon its very face, the introduction of coloring matter into what is claimed to be genuine butter.

And now a word to the Senator from Vermont. He said with great emphasis that he for one would not permit the poorest man in this country, if he could help it, to be cheated by a fraud. I say to him in the light of recent developments that if he votes for this bill he not only permits the poorest man in this country to be cheated, but he justifies that act by his vote if he votes for this bill.

I have said that the legislation, in my judgment, was unwise and vicious in its consequences. I do not want any man, poor or rich, in this country to be cheated by oleomargarine or Burlington (Vt.) coloring in butter either. The poor man in this country does not desire to be cheated himself. Still less does he desire that himself and his family shall be starved as the result of this special sumptuary legislation of Congress.

Sir, it is on a line, it is of a piece with the legislation of this Congress for twenty-five years, passing laws the effect of which is to put money into the pockets of the rich dairymen of New York and to deprive the millions of poor men in this country of buying in open market a cheap food for themselves and their families.

If the object of this legislation is simply to procure votes, if demagogism is at the bottom of it, and the farming element of this country is to be enlisted by these appeals for the "poor farmer," let me say to Senators there are more butter consumers in this country than butter producers. There are more people in this country who can not afford to give more than 14 or 15 or 20 cents per pound for a wholesome article than there are otherwise.

The effect of this bill will be, as I said, to legislate money into the pockets of the rich man, to widen the breach between the rich and the poor in this country, all under the guise of protection to American industry. You profess to protect the American laboring man by depriving him of the right to buy cheap food, assuming the guardianship over him, as if he were not a free American citizen able and competent to take care of himself. An artificial public opinion is created by stereotyped petitions sent from Chambers street, New York city, ostensibly in the interest of the farmers of the country, the practical effect of which means a blow at the poor man, to add to his burdens, to add to his discomforts, to deprive him and his wife and his children of the ability to buy cheap food, under the guise of protection to American labor. God save the mark!

Well might the laboring man exclaim, "Save me from my friends," if this is to be the evidence of their kindness. Under the progress of science a cheap article of food, perfectly wholesome food, is put at his command, and the rich dairyman of New York State comes to Congress and invokes the strong hand of the Government in his behalf to strike down this article of cheap food which has been placed at his door.

Mr. President, we all have great contempt for cheats and frauds, but the greatest of all is the cheat and fraud which comes to Congress to invoke its strong arm to oppress the weak and the poor men in this country.

Your high protective tariff, your labor bureaus, are given to the laborer when he asks for bread. You widen the breach between capital and labor by this class of legislation, and when the laboring man responds, through the ingenuity, I might say the deviltry of science, and when the anarchist responds to this legislation with dynamite and arson and murder and plunder, the bayonet is invoked and ball and cartridge used to suppress him.

I would not be understood as tolerating for one instant anarchy, or anarchists or socialists, but when we, intrusted by the people, exercising a high trust for their benefit, pervert the objects for which we were sent here so as to subvert the rights of the very people who require the protection of the law more than others, I must say that I listen with some impatience to the demand all over this country for armed soldiery to put down and suppress the freemen of the country for protesting against this class of legislation.

I do not believe that any appreciable number of farmers in this country have demanded this legislation. I believe it has been procured by interested dealers in this fraudulent article, made fraudulent by the use of the coloring matter referred to by the Senator from Kansas. I do not believe that if this question were submitted to-morrow to the honest farmers of this country, who love this country and love its liberties, they would in any appreciable numbers approve of this kind of legislation, which comes in under the pretense of being a bill to raise revenue, at the same time sustaining a fraud in the bill while pretending to strike down another.

Such a bill can never have my support, sir. As I said in the beginning, in my experience in this Government, in my knowledge of the history of legislation in this Government, I have never known a measure so entirely untenable as this is. I have never known a measure which flies so completely and squarely in the face of the fundamental law as does this bill; and if it should pass, I now predict that nothing will come of it except oppression and disaster and calamity to the best interests of the people of the country.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I rise to speak to this bill. I have been delayed by the progress of the discussion to this hour. If it is the desire of the Senate to proceed to a vote to-night I do not wish to delay that vote being taken; but I imagine that I should not meet with a very indulgent hearing at this hour, after meeting at the hour of eleven and it is now six, if I should occupy even a brief time, which is all the time that I expect to give to this bill in any remarks, and therefore I leave it for the Senate to say whatever they wish a majority will do.

Mr. CAMERON. With the consent of the Senator from New York I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. On Saturday I gave notice that I should ask the Senate to finish the consideration of the bill to-day. It has run much longer than I anticipated, and I am not disposed to burden the Senate by keeping them here beyond a reasonable hour. Notice was given last week of calling up another important matter to-morrow, and if the Senators interested in that would now by an arrangement consent to let it go over, and if we could have an understanding to vote on this bill absolutely to-morrow, or at 2 o'clock to-morrow, say, not before 2 o'clock——

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; do not fix an hour.

Mr. MILLER. I shall not attempt to fix the hour, but I do not propose to have the vote taken before 2 o'clock, so that everybody desiring to vote may be here. I understand that some Senators have to go out of town to-night and can not be back before 1 o'clock to-morrow; and therefore it would not do to vote previous to that time. My colleague has a speech for to-morrow, but I know of no other Senator desiring to speak. There may be a few other short speeches, which I do not think will take any long time to-morrow, and if the Senators having the other matter in charge, of which they gave notice, although there was no agreement that they should have to-morrow (but as it is a matter of high privilege I suppose they might not be inclined to waive it otherwise), will consent that that may go over until we can have a vote on the bill to-morrow, I shall be entirely willing to have the Senate adjourn now.

Owing to the condition of the public business, the appropriation bills, and the lateness of the session, it is very important that all these measures should be considered and brought to a final determination one way or the other; and as I hear no objection from the Senators who gave notice of calling up another matter to-morrow, if I can have an understanding that we shall go on with the bill in the morning and complete it and then that the other matter may come up, I shall be entirely willing now to adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. To vote at what time to-morrow?

Mr. MILLER. To vote to-morrow not before 1 o'clock and as soon after 1 as the discussion is closed. It is suggested that an agreement might be made to fix the hour for voting at 4 o'clock.

Mr. PUGH. I intended to make the call for the reports in the Payne case at 2 o'clock to-morrow. If that will suit the Senator from New York I will delay it until that hour.

Mr. MILLER. That will suit me if——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not do. We can not agree to take that matter up at that hour, because this bill must be finished first.

Mr. MILLER. I think the Senator from Alabama had better consent that the matter go over until this bill is finished, whether at 1 o'clock, 2, 4, 5, or 6 o'clock, whatever the hour may be.

Mr. CAMERON. I must insist on my motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that before we adjourn this evening we shall have some understanding in respect to the time when a vote shall be taken upon the bill to-morrow. I think that can very easily be arranged. I hope the Senator from Alabama will postpone any action in the matter he has in charge until this bill can be disposed of.

Mr. PUGH. I am willing to give until 3 o'clock, but I shall insist on asking the Senate to consider the Payne case at 3 o'clock. It is a matter of privilege.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to consent to take up any other business until this bill is disposed of. The matter of privilege, as it is called, is no more a matter of privilege in the judgment of the Senate by its votes than any other matter. It is a privileged question in the sense that it is one that belongs to the privileges of the Senate, but not in the sense that anybody has a right to insist upon its being considered at one time rather than another. It is just like the veto messages of the President of the United States, where the Constitution says we shall proceed to consider them. That means in our own time and in our own way.

So I object to any understanding by which any limitation is put upon the consideration of this bill until it is ended. I do not object to fixing an hour if I can have five minutes to reply to my friend from Kansas and to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina on two topics which they have presented; but I am going to object to everything that does not give me five minutes to say my say.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will permit me to say that I have been told to-day by older Senators and those more accustomed to parliamentary law and to the rules of the Senate that the question of privilege to be presented by the Senator from Alabama is of such a high order that it would take everything else out of the way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in the least.

Mr. MILLER. After the explanation of the Senator from Vermont I do not ask for any agreement, because I shall move to take up the bill the first thing in the morning, and I shall not yield to anything else until it is finished.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that we shall have some understanding as to the hour when the vote shall be taken on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I should like the Senator to yield for just one moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CAMERON. For a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say but one word. I do not very often ask courtesies of the Senate, but I am going away, and before I leave I should like to have the question of privilege disposed of. It will certainly come up soon, and I prefer to have it come up before I leave. The Senator from Vermont objects to everything, but of course his objection is not made with a view of preventing the question of privilege from coming up. However, when a bill has been discussed as long as this has been, it does seem to me as if an agreement might be made by the Senate that we would vote on it at 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock or some time to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to that, if I can have five minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. Five minutes! You can have forty minutes. Nobody objects to your speaking, and if he did it would not make any difference; you would speak anyhow; and so it is all right.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. VOORHEES. Ask for 3 o'clock.

Mr. LOGAN. I think an agreement might be reached and that everybody might be at least satisfied. I do not think there are very many Senators who want to discuss the question any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that at 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock——

Mr. LOGAN. Three o'clock.

Mr. EVARTS. If the Senator will allow me, I have a word to say on this subject. If the bill can be taken up after the morning work, as early as a quarter past 11 or half past 11 to-morrow, I will agree that the only space of time that I shall occupy will enable me to finish my remarks, and the vote could be taken, if there were not other speakers, very soon after 12. If I can begin at a quarter past 11 I shall be through before 12. The Senator from Vermont has claimed a very brief period for his address to the Senate. I am not advised that on this side of the Chamber other speakers are expecting to take part.

Mr. CULLOM. There may be two or three others.

Mr. EVARTS. There may be. I had learned that as my colleague did not desire to close the debate, I was proposing to close it on our side, and I had inquired to find out if there were others going to speak.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then let us come to an agreement to vote at 3 o'clock.

Mr. EVARTS. If it is true that there are other speakers, I can not say so distinctly as to the time that will be occupied.

Mr. MILLER. Having the bill in charge, I know of no one on this side of the Chamber who expects to speak except my colleague. I inquired on the other side and was told, of course not positively, but that the general understanding was the speeches had been finished. I suppose that other speeches, such as the Senator from Vermont proposes to make in reply to two Senators, will be very short. I desired to have my colleague close the debate on this side, if it were convenient to all the Senate. There might be speeches I know nothing about, but if we take two or three hours of time I have no doubt we shall give every one an opportunity to be heard who desires. I do not want to shut off any one. I ask that 3 o'clock be fixed as the time to take the vote to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say that I expect to occupy about ten minutes.

Mr. CULLOM. If we vote at 3 o'clock it will give every one an opportunity to speak who wishes to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request to the Senate. The Senator from New York asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that at 3 o'clock to-morrow the vote upon the pending bill shall be taken. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object if it is subject to my five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I object.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 20, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 19, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when

Mr. PAYSON said: Mr. Speaker, the entries in the Journal with reference to reports from committees are lengthy, and I therefore move that the reading of that part of the Journal be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MORROW, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to extend in the RECORD his remarks on the fortifications appropriation bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF A BILL.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to withdraw the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406 of the city of Washington, for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building, and to provide accommodations for the city post-office.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. WINANS, after to-morrow, for the remainder of the session, on account of important business.

COPY OF ENGROSSED BILL.

The SPEAKER. The engrossed copy of Senate bill 1042, to pay B. S. James for transporting the mails, was referred to the Committee on Claims, but has been mislaid. If there be no objection the Chair will direct an order to be made requesting the Senate to furnish the House another engrossed copy of said bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 9798) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, in order that we may pass it to-day so as to send it over to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up the fortifications appropriation bill. The question on Saturday when this bill was last before the House was upon ordering the previous question upon an amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. At that time we were dividing on the demand for the previous question, I having made the question of no quorum. I will withdraw my demand for a quorum, and hope the gentleman will yield to me five or ten minutes for discussion.

Mr. FORNEY. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. That arrangement, then, is agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Alabama has yielded the time to the gentleman from New York, but before he proceeds I want to ask consent to modify the second section of the bill by inserting after the word "implements," in the fourth line, that part of the section stricken out on the point of order relating to the use of materials of American production. What I ask is to insert what the committee originally had in at the place I have indicated. In other words, to make it distinct, I ask consent that after the word "implements" these words be added: "the materials for which shall be of American production;" so that this section will read, if amended as I suggest—

SEC. 2. For the armament of seacoast fortifications, including the procurement of steel forgings for the manufacture of heavy guns; for guns, carriages, projectiles, fuses, powder, implements, the materials for which shall be of American production, and their trial and proof, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, $500,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me suggest to the gentleman also that in the words—

Unless in the unanimous opinion of the board the interest of the Government will be better subserved by making purchases elsewhere—

The word "board" should be stricken out and "Department" inserted.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not willing to have those words in.

Mr. HISCOCK. But having stricken out the provision in reference to the board you will want to leave it to the Department to determine.

Mr. RANDALL. No; I want it just as I have stated the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I only call attention to the matter; I desire to make no point upon it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point of order was made upon the provision of the second section, which provides for the creation of a board that shall have the expenditure of the money for fortifications and their armament, and it was ruled out in committee.

When we went back into the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed to amend the bill by reducing the appropriation from $500,000 to $100,000, and I raised the question of no quorum, pending a division upon which question the House adjourned. I wanted an opportunity to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the provision of the Constitution in reference to the appointing power of the President is in the following language:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Here, sir, was a provision reported by the Committee on Appropriations of this House which proposed to create a board to take charge of the whole system of fortifications and expend the money; and that board under the provisions of this act would be appointed not by the President, under the Constitution but would be created in part by the Speaker of the House and in part by the President of the Senate.

The point I desired to make is that a provision of this kind is probably unconstitutional, as an encroachment upon the powers of the Executive and is without precedent in the history of our country. I desired to call the attention of the House, especially of the other side, to the fact that this provision was reported here coming from a committee in sympathy with the present Executive. There may be some legislation somewhere in the past in which Congress has been allowed to create a commission, appointing it also, to examine into some matter or to expend some paltry sum of money, where the act has been approved by the President; but I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, if in your experience ever before it was attempted to take the expenditure of the money for the fortifications, to take the charge of a great, vast system of work, from the President, through the War Department, and give it to a commission to be created by the legislative branch of the Government? I will appeal to my friend from Texas, Judge REAGAN, if in his experience he has ever seen the like? And, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania, after we had gone back into the House, made his motion to reduce this $500,000 to $100,000, as I understood him to make the motion because the gentleman from Connecticut had made a point of order against this proposed legislation, and because he had not succeeded in having the expenditure of this money and the control of the work in part taken from the present administration, when he made his motion to reduce the amount carried by the bill as I then supposed for that purpose, I desired to emphasize his position before the country and before this House.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not want to do the gentleman injustice. I understand his object.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state what was my object. It was not that I might have my way, but that the House might have its way by a vote on that proposition, which the point of order made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] prevented.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely willing the bill should remain at $500,000 provided the material is to be purchased in the United States; but he proposes to reduce it to $100,000 if the provision for the purchase is stricken out of the bill. But I sympathize with that purpose. At the time I understood it to be a threat to the House that you shall not have this appropriation of $500,000 unless you allow us to take the expenditure of the money from the administration—which of course we have no great feeling about—unless we would allow the creation of a board, which we seriously think unconstitutional. To that I for one have decided objection. If we have the power to take from the President and the War Department the work and to create a commission to take charge of it, of which one member is to be appointed by yourself, Mr. Speaker, and one member by the President of the Senate, we have the power to provide that every member of that commission shall be appointed by you. The result would be an encroachment upon the power and prerogative of the Executive; and we are all interested in seeing that the lines between the powers of the executive and the legislative branches of the Government are maintained and strictly observed.

Mr. RANDALL. I have only one word to say. The House and the Senate every year indicate by a joint resolution the managers of the Soldiers' Home. Now, if the gentleman from New York expresses his opinion as a lawyer that this board is unconstitutional, that is one matter.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do.

Mr. RANDALL. But why not let the House pass upon that question whether it is constitutional or not, and not prevent it by a point made by a single member in the manner in which it was done? The board is a mere auxiliary to the Department.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Are the managers of the Soldiers' Home officers of the United States?

Mr. RANDALL. They are officers of an institution organized by the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. When before did Congress ever attempt to take the expenditure of money for the fortifications of our coast away from the President and the War Department?

Mr. RANDALL. I have stated the reasons we had for the proposition in the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. If the purpose was to take from the War Department and the President the power to control the expenditures on the fortifications of the country, perhaps the gentleman from New York is right in his position. But this seems to have been merely proposed as an auxiliary to aid the President and the Secretary of War in the performance of the work.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It was an absolute condition imposed upon and affixed to an appropriation for fortifications.

Mr. RANDALL. At the solicitation of the gentleman from Alabama I withdraw the amendment to reduce the amount from $500,000 to $100,000.

Mr. FORNEY. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The following amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was read:

Amend section 2 by inserting after the word "proof," in line 4, the words "and the testing of improvements of the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I would be glad to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania read in its connection.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] on Saturday has been withdrawn, and this morning by unanimous consent words have been inserted which require the material to be of American production.

Mr. RANDALL. That was in the bill, but went out on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "implements," in line 4 of section 2, insert "and the materials shall be all of American production."

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that it read "the materials for which," &c.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FORNEY. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a question of order. On Saturday evening the House had under consideration a resolution providing for the printing of the third annual report of the Civil Service Commission, and the previous question was ordered on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks that the House proceed to the consideration of the resolution he has indicated, on which the previous question was ordered on Saturday evening. The Clerk will report the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 6, 1886.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the third annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission be printed, and that 26,000 additional copies be printed; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House, and 20,000 copies for distribution by the commission: Provided, That appendices 8 and 9 of the report as published by the House of Representatives, Executive Document No. 140, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, be omitted by the Public Printer in printing this edition.

Mr. RANDALL. My recollection is that the previous question was not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that it was. The RECORD shows the previous question was ordered and that afterward the resolution was passed over.

Mr. RANDALL. The resolution was withdrawn, if I recollect aright. What does the Journal show?

Mr. DINGLEY. The previous question was ordered, and then the consideration of the resolution was passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is a correct statement of the case. The previous question was ordered, but the Chair understood that the request to lay the resolution aside disposed of it, and that was the understanding of the House.

The SPEAKER. The record shows that the previous question was ordered, and that after that, by unanimous consent, the resolution was passed over.

Mr. DINGLEY. Passed over for the present.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is the fact.

Mr. SPRINGER. After the previous question was ordered the question came up on the passage of the resolution and a quorum was demanded, and that would have broken up the session. Therefore, when the point that no quorum had voted was insisted upon, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] in charge of the resolution asked to have it passed over in order to take up another matter. That was agreed to. As to the effect of that order, it may not have been clearly understood by the House at the time, and the parliamentary effect of it is of course to be now decided by the Speaker. It was understood, however, by most of the members present, especially by those who objected to the resolution, that it was withdrawn from the consideration of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. It was simply understood and stated that it was passed over for the present. That is the language as reported in the RECORD.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. The understanding of the committee was that the resolution was withdrawn; and this morning I was directed by the chairman to request our associate, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], to introduce it at the proper time when there was a full House. The committee understood that it was withdrawn.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question as to the understanding of the House. The House did not understand that the previous question was ordered upon this resolution with the expectation that it would come up again to-day. They understood that the effect of the order was the withdrawal of the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. That was not the understanding of many of the gentlemen present. If they had so understood it they would have objected. As appears from the RECORD the request was for unanimous consent that the resolution should be passed over "for the present," and that was agreed to. If the request had been for unanimous consent for the withdrawal of the resolution, certainly objection would have been made.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I made objection to the laying aside of the resolution and afterward withdrew my objection, with the understanding that the resolution was to be passed over—not that it was to be withdrawn, but that it was to be passed over for the present, the previous question having been ordered upon it. I should not have withdrawn my objection had I understood that the resolution was to be withdrawn, and the withdrawal of my objection was based upon the understanding that the resolution was merely passed over for the time.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that it was not the understanding of the committee that the resolution was totally withdrawn from the consideration of the House, but that it was to be called up when there was a full House.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understood that it was to be simply passed over.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. It is a privileged resolution, which can be called up at any time, and it was the intention of the chairman when he withdrew it to call it up again at the proper time.

Mr. SPRINGER. He has a right to call it up now.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD shows the following proceedings on the subject:

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask that this resolution be laid aside for the present.
Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I object.
Mr. BENNETT. How long does the gentleman propose to lay it aside?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his objection?
Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I have objected.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on his objection?
Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is the gentleman from North Carolina going to insist upon a quorum?
Mr. BENNETT. Does the gentleman address his question to me?
Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes.
Mr. BENNETT. Dead certain. [Laughter.]
Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. As the gentleman, a friend of the administration which went into power pledged to civil-service reform, proposes to call a quorum, I will withdraw my objection.
By unanimous consent the resolution was passed over for the present.

The Journal also shows that the resolution was passed over for the present, the previous question having been ordered upon it. The Chair supposes that under the practice of the House that would bring this resolution up for consideration this morning.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a privileged resolution, anyway.

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is a privileged resolution.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then it can be called up now.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be again read.

The SPEAKER. It has been read; but if there be no objection the Clerk will again report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 6, 1886.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the third annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission be printed, and that 26,000 additional copies be printed; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House, and 20,000 copies for distribution by the commission: Provided, That appendices 8 and 9 of the report as published by the House of Representatives, Executive Document No. 140, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, be omitted by the Public Printer in printing this edition.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I call for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and the reading of the report is in the nature of debate. The House does not vote on the report, but simply on the resolution.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, there were—ayes 111, noes 28.

Mr. BENNETT. No quorum.

Mr. DINGLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 58 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 187, nays 46, not voting 89; as follows:

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to make the following privileged report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday afternoon next, at 5 o'clock p. m., the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills authorizing the construction of bridges reported from the Committee on Commerce; that on this day at 5 o'clock p. m. the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to measures presented by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; that the sessions herein provided for shall not extend beyond 11 o'clock p. m.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not do that, as I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does that mean to-night?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What committee does this come from?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules, the resolution having been sent to that committee.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is it not subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question is ordered. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand, as I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the evening session for to-night?

The SPEAKER. Yes, to-night.

The question recurred on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 42.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No quorum.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STRUBLE. Let the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question. The proposition is to set apart this evening from 8 to 11 o'clock for the consideration of bills coming from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and to-morrow evening from 8 to 11 o'clock for the consideration of bills authorizing the construction of bridges reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 162, nays 69, not voting 91; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the last vote taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen for and fifteen minutes against the resolution. If no gentleman desires to be heard the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not care particularly about debating this question, but I should like to say a word on the general subject involved.

As I understand this resolution comes from the Committee on Rules, and assumes the magnitude of fixing two nights for the consideration of bills. In all the years that I have been here I have never seen a proposition of that kind coming from the Committee on Rules before. I never saw a rule reported from the committee of such a character as that—a rule whose only purpose is to serve a temporary object and to serve some particular committee whose bills are to be considered. I have no objection in the world to the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Commerce, nor to the consideration of those bills reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

But if the rules of the House are to be converted into machines for the purpose of effecting temporary objects of this kind, if the powers of the Committee on Rules, with its special prerogatives and special powers, are to be perverted to the mere object of fixing a night or a day for the consideration of special bills to be reported from some particular committee—I say if that plan is to obtain there soon will cease to be any respect for the rules of the House at all.

Rules, as I understand them, are to serve general purposes and objects, and are to be made to meet classes of objects. They are not to be prepared and passed merely for the purpose of effecting some special object, some particular subject, or some merely temporary purpose; and I think it is placing in the hands of the Committee on Rules a power which should be denied to it by the members of the House. It will come to this, if this sort of plan is to obtain here in the House, that soon the fixing of a day for the consideration of bills, or the fixing of a time for taking up some special measure, will simply lie in the hands of the Committee on Rules.

The Committee on Commerce having jurisdiction over bills relating to bridges, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads having jurisdiction over the affairs of that Department, will not be able to call up their measures, but will be compelled to bow obeisance to the Committee on Rules, and that committee, by special favoritism, or at least by a preference which will be expressed in the way of some temporary expedient of this kind, will come in and say we report a rule, which is a privileged question, and we will fix next Friday night, or next Saturday night, or any other night they see proper, for the consideration of measures reported from these committees.

I say I have no antagonism to the measures to be proposed by these committees, but I do protest against this prostitution of the principle upon which the rules of the House were founded and upon which the measures of this House are to be considered; and I want every committee to stand upon a fair footing of equality here, with the right to come in here with its measures and have them considered on the days on which they may properly be considered. I do not think it is right in any respect, and I think it will lead to the overthrow of all rules. It will do more, Mr. Speaker; it will generate a disrespect for the very rules which are intended to be equal in their effect and application and to serve all the members and all the committees of the House alike.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a suggestion or two in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I agree with him that it is unfortunate the Committee on Rules should be called upon to exercise this power; but, sir, in the last days of the session we always find the calendars crowded with an immense amount of legislation to which there is no objection, and yet we have not the time to reach it. We have invented rules that bills should be considered if there were not ten objections to them or five objections to them, in some way attempting to get rid of the power of one man to defeat all of this sort of legislation; and that practice, or the practice under those rules, has really not effected anything in the way of giving relief in the passage of this character of bills. The motive of the Committee on Rules in this matter is this: To get before the House in these last days of the session that legislation to which there is practically no opposition and utilize our evenings in the passage of bills to which there is no objection; and if there is any gentleman here who is able to invent a better method or more effective method than this I have no doubt it will be adopted by the Committee on Rules, of which I am a humble member and in the minority. But I desire to say that this thing has not been done with reference to running the House, grasping power, or creating an abuse. We have adopted this method as the only one by which we can get before the House and pass bills to which there is no objection.

Mr. BAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois so much time as he may desire.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, all that the gentleman from New York has said amounts simply to this: That under the rules which exist we find it inconvenient or difficult at this part of the session to transact the public business. That is all of his argument. Now, my opinion of a rule is that it is a law of general application to the class which goes before it; and we have in the book of rules provisions for suspending the rules, but the rules provide that motions to suspend shall only be made on particular days and under particular regulations.

Now, I insist that where we have a rule that the House shall adjourn at 5 o'clock until the next day, a rule, or a so-called rule, that on a particular evening the House shall not adjourn, but shall take a recess for an evening session for the particular business of a particular committee—that is nothing more nor less than a proposition to suspend the rules. And I think my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] would find it rather difficult to point out a logical distinction between a rule which applied to a particular committee on a particular evening in regard to a particular sort of business and a suspension of the rule.

Therefore this alleged rule, as it is called, amounts simply to this: that although the members of this House can not move to suspend the rules except in the mode provided in the book of rules, yet the Committee on Rules shall have the power to suspend the rules at any time; and I doubt whether that is a power which ought wisely to be given to any committee whatever.

Mr. MORRISON. After the very clear and candid statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] I hardly need to say more. Under our rules fixing the adjournment at 5 o'clock there is no other practical way of getting evening sessions than the one proposed in this resolution, and if we provided for an evening session without determining the business to be considered, gentlemen very well understand committees would contend for precedence with each other and there would be nothing done. Gentlemen know, too, how very improbable it is that any measure will pass at an evening session to which there is any objection; for it has seldom, if ever, occurred, and probably never will, that on any of these occasions, or night sessions, we have a quorum; so that any member can prevent the passage of any measure which is objectionable to him by his single objection. Still much useful legislation may be, and frequently is, accomplished at these evening sessions.

I do not need to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] to the fact that it was only a short time ago when the Committee on Rules made a rule to apply to one bill only and providing how it should be voted on, and both those gentlemen supported it. And I have already said how very improbable it is that any objectionable measure would be passed at an evening session with but few members present.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will my colleague admit that that very instance he has cited met with very general criticism inside the House and outside the House? And will he point out the distinctions between such a rule as this and suspending the rules?

Mr. MORRISON. It met with no criticism from the gentlemen who complain of this. I suppose the trouble about this, and the apprehensions of my two excellent friends comes from the fact that at Saint Louis a very enterprising citizen, a man who is chief in many valuable enterprises, owns a bridge, and there are people who want to build another. This seems to have excited the apprehensions of other cities and of gentlemen along the line of some roads that go over the old bridge. I do not know if the two things have any connection with each other, but it is very improbable the evening session will result in the passage of that new bridge measure if one of those excellent gentlemen is here to say "I object."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The last remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] induce me to say this: He has intimated that probably the objection to the building of another bridge at some point was the cause of this trouble. I want to say simply this to the House, that I have not objected this morning to this resolution passing, nor do I object to the construction of another bridge at the city of Saint Louis. But I do represent thousands of people and millions of dollars in the Mississippi Valley that are opposed to the construction of a low bridge at the city of Saint Louis which will interfere with the navigation of the Mississippi. I am prepared here and now, as I have repeatedly said to the friends of the low bridge at Saint Louis, to favor the construction of another bridge, and still another if they want it, provided it is made a high bridge so as not to interfere with the navigation of that stream. I have no antagonism to granting every facility which the city of Saint Louis may desire; but I do object to handicapping or jeopardizing the interests of the Mississippi Valley for the interests of a few who want to build a little cheaper bridge at Saint Louis. Neither do I represent, nor do those who are with me represent, any of the elements that are interested in the present high bridge. I understand statements of that kind have been made here by gentlemen in this House. That is not so. We know nothing of those interests there in the present high bridge; but we simply protest against the construction of another bridge with a draw to it below the mouth of the Missouri River, which would jeopardize and interfere with the navigation of the Mississippi River.

We are opposed to millions of dollars being expended for the improvements of the Mississippi and then putting clogs and interruptions in the way of the free navigation of that river after these improvements are made. All I had desired in my amendment was to confine the evening session under the operation of this resolution to the consideration of those other bills to which, as the gentleman from New York has said, there is practically no opposition.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not know that the Saint Louis bridge bill is a proper subject of discussion now; but I will say one word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa. He tells the House he is in favor of building a high bridge at Saint Louis, or if need be two, or as many as are needed to subserve the interests of commerce.

When the gentleman says that he is opposed to this bill and in favor of a high bridge he says, in substance, that he is opposed to the construction of any bridge there. It is proposed by those having this project in charge to build a bridge, either a high or a low one, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, will not interfere with the uninterrupted navigation of the river. It is proposed to build a bridge that will be practically a free bridge.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does not your bill provide for the collection of tolls?

Mr. CLARDY. It provides that no higher rate of toll shall be charged on the bridge than is charged on the roads leading to the bridge.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes; but it is a toll-bridge.

Mr. CLARDY. The tolls will scarcely amount to enough to keep the bridge in running order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. We are perfectly willing that you shall make it a free bridge, for that matter. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CLARDY. Now I do not know but what gentlemen who surmise that there will not be a quorum here to-morrow night are correct. I had supposed that there would not be a quorum, and that we would not call up this bridge bill, which we knew would be antagonized. I do not suppose that this resolution was presented to this House in order to accommodate the proponent of that measure; in fact, I am sure it was not.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Your Saint Louis papers have said for ten days past that this was to be done in the interest of that bill.

Mr. CLARDY. I am not altogether responsible for what the newspapers state. I want to say this in addition to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has said in reference to the opposition to this bill: There are some gentlemen who live in the districts represented by my friend from Iowa and by certain other gentlemen who occupy hundreds of acres of land for which they pay an annual rental and who are interested in getting that land at a cheap rent. But if this bridge be built the value of those lands will be enhanced, and instead of renting them by the acre these gentlemen will be compelled to buy them by the foot or else move their lumber yards. That is how this project will affect their interests. But the people of Saint Louis, the people of Missouri, and I think I may add the people of Illinois, are more interested in cheap transportation than they are in cheap rents for these gentlemen, who have already made their tens of thousands and their millions of dollars out of the people of that city and of those States.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And the cost of transportation on the Mississippi River, compared with the cost of transportation on the railroads that run beside it, is as one dollar to five. We can deliver our lumber there for $1 a thousand, when your railroads would charge $5 a thousand.

Mr. CLARDY. And the transportation on the river is trifling in amount compared with the transportation by rail.

Mr. MORRISON. We built a bridge across the river just 20 miles from the point where it is proposed to build this one, and the gentleman from Iowa sat in his seat and never said a word.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills.

REPEAL OF THE PRE-EMPTION LAW, ETC.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House 7887, "to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, all laws allowing entries for timber-culture, and all laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

T. R. COBB,
W. J. STONE,
L. E. PAYSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. N. DOLPH,
P. B. PLUMB,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on accepting the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement in connection with this report. The conference committees of the two Houses had a meeting and quite an extended conference, but failed to agree. The main point of difference is upon the first and eighth sections, the Senate amendments, which would confirm all the fraudulent titles or entries that have been made heretofore. The committee on the part of the House believe that that ought not to be done. I do not now desire, however, to take up more of the time of the House, and I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], reserving my remaining time.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the pending question, as I understand it, is on the motion to insist upon the disagreement between the House and the Senate.

The SPEAKER. That motion has not been made.

Mr. PAYSON. Assuming that it will be made, I address myself to that. Of course on the general question I do not care at present to occupy any time or to tax further the attention of the House. For the purposes of this motion it is enough to say that upon the question as to the repeal of the pre-emption and the timber-culture law the Senate and House agree, and the conferees have informally agreed to concur with reference to that. But the point of difference between the two committees of conference may be briefly stated to be this: The Senate has amended the House bill by inserting in the first section of it a validating clause as to all entries which may have been made where there has been a conveyance by the entryman and a sale of his interest made prior to the 1st day of June, 1886.

The avowed object of the insertion of that validating clause on the part of the Senate conferees is to wipe out every question connected with the fraudulent entry where the entryman has sold his land prior to that date—as one of the Senate conferees expressed it, "to turn over a new leaf."

For the past four years, as is well known, this House has passed appropriations of $95,000 or $100,000 each year for the purpose of detecting these frauds, having the entries canceled, and preserving the lands affected by these entries for honest settlers. It is proposed by this amendment to undo everything which has been done by the Land Department during these years, and present to these people who claim to be purchasers from these entrymen a bill of peace. On that question, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office have both expressed themselves earnestly. I ask the Clerk to read, as the sentiment of the Secretary of the Interior, a portion of a letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

9. I also disapprove of the provision in section 1, lines 16 to 22, confirming all pre-emption entries heretofore made on proof of sale and in the absence of adverse claims.

It condones all such fraudulent claims in the past, even those where the question has been adjudicated and the entries legally canceled, and it invites new frauds in the future by providing such a precedent. It does not limit the sales to those made prior to that act, but invites every fraudulent pre-emptor to make a swift conveyance of his claim, pretended or otherwise, and evade the penalty of the law. Its evident purpose is, however, not so much the relief of entrymen as of their assignees, of whom, it is notorious, there is a large number who have got into their hands great tracts of lands by means of the grossest frauds and perjuries, which they have aided and abetted. If the provision is made to apply to sales made before final entry, it would be a condonation of another class of frauds in both vendor and vendee. If the cases to be affected by it were few in number, or of unexpected hardship, there might be some excuse for such a provision; but in fact they are numerous, and the hardship rests deservedly and almost wholly on the speculators, who have evaded the law by inducing ignorant men or their own servants to settle on lands under a pretense, to swear falsely to their bona fides at date of entry, and theretofore or thereafter to convey to them. Such a provision is, in my judgment, wholly indefensible.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the concluding clause of the extract just read by the Clerk expresses in clear terms the judgment of the Interior Department with reference to the Senate amendment to the House bill. The Secretary says:

Such a provision is, in my judgment, wholly indefensible.

So the House conferees believe, and so does the Committee on Public Lands; and the necessity for such a provision nowhere appears.

In the last Congress a bill passed both Houses which was identical practically with the bill which we sent over to the Senate at this session, and which has had these provisions ingrafted upon it. The House conferees have endeavored to the best of their ability to secure from the Senate conferees the adoption of that proposition, pure and simple.

I include as a part of my remarks a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on this subject, carefully prepared, and presenting clearly the objections to the Senate amendments:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 30, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your request for a condensed statement of objections to the amendment to the bill for the repeal of the pre-emption laws, &c., I respectfully refer you to the following:

1. The second clause of the first section, confirming all entries heretofore made under the pre-emption laws and which may have been sold to "bona fide purchasers," must have the effect, if any, to validate and confirm all illegal and fraudulent entries so made under that act.

This provision, and a similar provision in the eighth section in respect to final entries hereafter made under the pre-emption and homestead acts, are in contravention of well-settled principles of the law of real property and of the law of equity. I think that neither under the civil law nor the common law, nor in any legal authorities, nor in any decision under the public land laws, is it or has it ever been asserted that a person can be an innocent purchaser who buys of one who does not own the legal title. Equity never relieves in such cases, and there is no reason why it should.

In private transactions the owner of property is not expected to indemnify a person against loss who purchases from one who has merely a claim to a legal title but not the legal title itself. The doctrine of caveat emptor is as good against a purchaser of property claimed to be derived from the United States as against the purchaser of property claimed to be derived from any other source.

The property of the United States in its public lands is as sacred as the property of individuals, and no good reason would appear to exist why legal principles should be violated and the public domain sacrificed to make good to the purchasers of fraudulent entries, or to speculators in them, titles which may be either absolutely void or voidable in law.

The classes of people who will chiefly be benefited by the proposed legislation are corporations and syndicates, who have covered grazing and timber lands with a cloud of false entries, and money-lenders, who have taken worthless mortgages at exorbitant rates of interest and other charges. Doubtless individual citizens may also have been misled by erroneous advice or persuaded by land or loan agents to invest their money without looking to the foundations of their titles, but such persons have no possible claim upon the United States. Their purchases were private transactions with which the United States had nothing to do. The public records were open to their inspection. They knew, or might have known, that their vendors were not the owners of the land, but had only a claim to it, and that the validity of this claim depended upon its merits. They are charged with a knowledge of the law that all claims under the public land acts are subject to a final confirmation and are liable to defeat, and that titles do not pass until patents issue. If, in some individual cases, the purchasers of inchoate titles have suffered a misfortune which appeals to personal sympathy, and if such cases were a proper subject for public relief, it would be far better that direct money appropriations should be made than that a horde of false and fraudulent claims should be rushed through to patent by force of Congressional confirmation in order to save certain persons from the consequence of their own indiscretion.

In my letter to Mr. Cobb of March 12 last, I cited authorities running from 1836 to the present time, uniformly sustaining the legal propositions above set forth. There has been no break in the long line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme courts of the several States, the opinions of Attorneys-General, and the decisions of this office and Department upon the point involved.

A recent decision by Judge Deady to the contrary is in contravention of all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the principles of the decisions cited in its support.

In the case of Harkness vs. Underhill, 1 Black, 316, the court specifically overruled the precise points raised by Judge Deady, and in the case of Barnard's Heirs vs. Ashley's Heirs, 18 Howard, 43, the court explained certain decisions which had been misconstrued, which misconstruction is carried into Judge Deady's opinion, and showed conclusively that said decisions did not bear the construction put upon them.

The case of Carroll vs. Safford, 3 Howard, 460, cited as sustaining the opinion of Judge Deady, was a case arising in 1836, of a purchase of land at private cash sale, where the only conditions of entry were that the land should be subject to sale and should be paid for. In that case, as in others in which the effect of a certificate of purchase has been regarded as entitling the purchaser to a patent, the court expressly said that if the lands were not subject to entry the entry would be invalid. The principle of the decision was that the validity of the certificate depended upon the legality of its issue. There was but one point upon which its validity could be questioned, because there was but that one condition, besides payment, attached to the purchase. Where other conditions are attached to the making of an entry, necessarily those other conditions must also be satisfied. There is therefore no conflict in decisions of the Supreme Court upon the point raised, and the cases cited in support of Judge Deady's opinion are all of the two classes above named, being either those overruled by subsequent or higher decisions, or those which have been misinterpreted and the misinterpretation corrected by the court itself, or apparent on the face of the record.

No honest entry needs a confirmation by Congress. It is the history of this office and Department that liberality to claimants under the public-land laws is carried to extreme lengths, and only those cases in which illegality or fraud are conclusively shown by record facts and testimony taken upon formal hearings, or by failure of interested parties to attempt to controvert the evidence in possession of the Government, are canceled. Consequently it is only these cases—the undeniably illegal or flagrantly fraudulent cases—that will be affected by the amendment, and these are confirmed out of hand, the frauds condoned, and more frauds invited by the nature of the amendment.

2. The last clause of the first section of the Senate amendment provides for the location of soldiers' additional homestead entries by assignees. This provision is not in the interest of soldiers, their heirs or legal representatives, by whom the location may now be made, but is exclusively in the interest of the speculative holders of such claims. I think legislation in the interest of any character of speculation in public land unwise, inexpedient, and contrary to good policy.

These claims are sold in the market, as I am advised, for $16 per acre, but the soldier receives no benefit from that price. Under the present law the claims are not assignable, but the location must be made by the soldier or in his name. The bill makes them assignable, which is in aid of speculation in them.

3. The last proviso in the second section of the Senate amendment repeals the existing requirement that timber-culture entrymen, in making final proof, must show that the specified number of trees were planted on each acre. This requirement is one of the conditions upon which all timber-culture entries have been made. Its repeal changes the contract in favor of the entryman, and enables proof to be made upon natural trees, when they may exist, instead of cultivated ones.

4. In a letter to Senator COCKRELL, dated 21st instant, from which extracts are made in this letter, it was stated in reference to the third section of the Senate bill as follows:

"The third section amends the desert-land act in some meritorious particulars, but embraces other provisions of a different character, the principal of which is the incorporation of a right of assignment of the unperfected entry. This feature changes fundamentally the underlying principle of the public-land laws that entries shall be made for the exclusive benefit of entrymen, and not for the benefit of other persons, and it practically abrogates existing restrictions of the act limiting one person to one entry of 640 acres. By the proposed amendment any purchaser of desert entries may obtain as great a quantity of land which has been heretofore entered or which may be hereafter entered under this act as he may be able or may choose to pay for. That it is the purpose of the amendment to aggregate entries in single or corporate hands is shown by the clause providing for the association of entrymen and the filing of joint maps, coupled with the right of assignment. In Wyoming, Montana, and elsewhere great bodies of land have been covered by consecutive desert-land entries, embracing the water privileges of many square miles of territory. To legalize the assignment and consolidation of these entries as proposed by the Senate amendment is to create a land monopoly of vaster proportions than any against which publicists have warned the country or political conventions have denounced.

"Another objection to the amendment is that the provisions of the desert-land act are extended to another State (namely, Colorado) than the States to which it was confined by the original act. The public injury already done under this act, which, as stated by my predecessor, operates not to the reclamation of land but to its misappropriation and the prevention of reclamation, should not be extended to embrace additional territory. Legislation clamored for by monopolists is not legislation presumptively in the public interests."

The report of proceedings in the Senate shows that the words "or his assignors," in line 18, page 4, and the words "or his assigns," in line 67, page 6, were stricken out, and that the Senate subsequently refused to restore said words. Yet those words appear in the bill as passed.

5. The fifth section extends the homestead privilege to single females between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one. As young girls are not expected, as a class, to take up public land for the purpose of a home, and to live alone upon isolated claims, there would seem to be no utility in this provision, at least not for any purpose of promoting actual settlements.

6. The sixth section authorizing the transfer of any portion of a claim under the settlement laws for church, cemetery, or school purposes, or for the right of way for railroads, canals, or ditches, adds to existing law (section 2288, Revised Statutes) the words "canals or ditches for irrigation or drainage." As the right of way for the latter purposes is already secured by general law (sections 2339, 2340 Revised Statutes), the occasion for this amendment is not evident. The objection to it, apart from its apparent want of utility for any necessary purpose, is the liability of its use for the consummation of frauds upon a great scale. "Any portion" of an entry may be so transferred. The words "any portion" include the whole. Entire claims may therefore be transferred under the proposed amendment for the ostensible purpose named. It is not necessary that any canals or ditches should actually be constructed. The claims can be transferred for the alleged purpose of constructing them, and the amount of land that may be thus acquired by corporations or individuals may be limited only by the extent of territory desired to be dominated.

It may be suggested that the above objections would equally apply to the provisions in respect to tracts for cemetery or school purposes, but this is not the fact, because fraudulent entries are not presumed to be sought for those purposes, but are known to have been largely made in the special interests for which the amendment would naturally be available.

7. The seventh section provides a new form of entry, to wit, "mountain homesteads" of 320 acres. No cultivation of the land is required. It opens up the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico to an easy form of fraudulent entry, which, falling under the provisions of the eighth section of the Senate amendment, will be protected and validated by the enforced confirmations of that section.

8. The eighth section is the germ and essence of the entire amendment. This section practically cuts off adverse claims and effectually prohibits contests against invalid entries, also rendering impossible an official investigation of fraudulent ones; confirms all entries that may be sold, however false or baseless, unless knowledge of the fraud is brought to attention within an impossible period; deprives the Land Department of its jurisdiction to determine the validity of claims against the United States under the public-land laws; transfers executive functions to the judiciary; imposes upon the courts duties which if they could be performed would require a quadruplication of the judicial establishment, and makes an absolute confirmation after two years of all entries not otherwise confirmed in fact or effect by other provisions of this section and bill.

I regard this section as a nullification of all guards and restrictions in the public-land laws; as a reversal of the whole policy of legislation in respect to the acquisition of individual titles to public land; as a repudiation of the pledges of political parties and conventions to preserve the public domain for actual settlements, and, in short, as the destruction of the public-land system of the United States. And I perceive that this radical change can have no other effect than to promote the interests of speculation and monopoly.

9. The ninth section, providing that suits to vacate patents shall not be brought after seven years from the date of the passage of the act or five years from the date of the issue of patents hereafter, would have the effect to validate both void and voidable patents even in the hands of the patentees, unless suit should be brought within the time fixed, which is wholly impossible, particularly in respect to patents issued to corporations when the bringing of the suit may depend upon the settlement of questions that may not even be considered within the term of five years.

It is said that some limitation of time is necessary within which public-land entries shall be liable to attack by individuals or to inquiry by the Government, in order that certainty in land titles may be assured, it may be replied that the same reason would apply to claims for money out of the Treasury, since such claims, equally with claims for public land from the treasury of the public domain, are the subject of sale and assignment; that unless the public-land system should be changed to favor speculative proprietorship instead of actual inhabitancy there is no substantial reason for anticipating the regular and orderly termination of cases; and, further, that another and better method exists by which a final adjudication of claims can be facilitated. This is by a simple repeal of laws under which the most extensive frauds have been committed, thus preventing their future perpetration, and by increasing the facilities of this office for the examination of existing claims so that the work can be speedily performed, false claims discovered and suppressed, and good ones confirmed and patented.

10. The tenth section of the amendment retains the provision that abandoned military reservations shall remain subject to sale as provided by the act of July 5, 1884. The reasons why such lands should not be sold at public sale as provided by said act are set forth in my annual report, page 75, as follows:

"RELINQUISHED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

"By the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, providing for the disposal of abandoned military reservations, the lands are required to be appraised and sold at public sale for cash. Settlers entering upon such reservations after January 1, 1884, are not protected against these cash sales. Petitions and memorials have been received by this office representing that the effect of the law is disadvantageous to settlements, and urging executive recommendation for its modification or repeal. It is alleged that settlers can not compete with rich syndicates in the purchase of such lands, and that the result will necessarily be that the large bodies of land embraced in these reservations will pass into single or corporate possession, to the disadvantage of the settlement and prosperity of the country.

"Thirty-seven reservations have been turned over to this Department under this act, the majority of which contains area ranging from 5,000 to 100,000 acres each, and aggregating about 627,000 acres.

"The amount of land embraced in existing reservations that have not been relinquished by the War Department is estimated at about 2,500,000 acres.

"These reservations are chiefly in the Territories. They were selected by the military authorities for their advantages in respect to grass, wood, and water, and for these reasons invite settlement. It has not been the experience of this office that public cash sales of lands augment the revenues of the Government to a degree to make that form of disposal desirable as a matter of economy or of public policy. I know of no public reason why relinquished military reservations should be sold at public cash sale as a special class of lands. The buildings on the land are of little value to the Government after their use has ceased, and can be sold to as good or better advantage by the War Department before the reservations are relinquished than by the Land Department afterward. Custodians have to be appointed and paid, and this expense, with the cost of appraisal and sale, is likely to amount to as much or more than the buildings are worth. Their rapid deterioration after abandonment is another element to be considered. The past experience of this office is not favorable to this method of disposing of abandoned buildings.

"Interested parties desiring to secure large bodies of land naturally seek to hasten the extinction of reservations, but in my judgment the time is rapidly approaching when people needing homes will rejoice if Government reservations shall have saved any considerable amount of public lands from present indiscriminate appropriation. If, however, these reserved lands are to be disposed of at or soon after their abandonment for military purposes, I do not think a monopoly of them should be allowed to cash purchasers, but that an honest attempt at least should be made to enable bona fide settlers to obtain them."

In brief, I may say in general terms that the objections to the Senate amendment are to all those respects in which it adds to the House bill matters not necessarily connected with the repeals proposed, and which, as radically changing the theory, policy, and purpose of the public-land laws, should receive deliberate and independent consideration.

If it is the will of Congress to destroy the public-land system and turn over what is left of the public domain to speculators and spoliators, the pending amendment should be concurred in. If it is the intention to keep the public faith that has repeatedly been pledged to the people that the remaining public lands should be disposed of only for actual settlement and be subject only to an honest appropriation for that purpose, the amendment should not receive approval.

Your attention is called to my report, May 6, 1886 (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 134), showing that, with the increased force asked for, the pending cases of final entry can reasonably be expected to be closed within a year and a half.

I also respectfully call your attention to marked paragraphs in my predecessor's annual report for 1884, pages 15, 16, and 17, and in my report for 1885, pages 64-67, relative to examinations of entries, and to other marked paragraphs in reports for 1883, 1884, and 1885, relating specifically to different classes of entry.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. J[illegible], Commissioner.

Hon. L. E. PAYSON, House of Representatives.

As to the propriety of the repeal of the pre-emption law, the Senate conferees agree with us; as to the propriety of the repeal of the timber-culture law, they agree with us; but they insist upon ingrafting upon these repealing enactments a provision validating and condoning these frauds—whether of greater or less degree I am not here to argue, for it is utterly immaterial—but they insist as a condition precedent that this provision shall be inserted, or the repeal remain inoperative.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is there in the bill any saving provision whatever?

Mr. PAYSON. There is. The House bill as sent to the Senate preserves the right of every bona fide settler and purchaser under the general land laws down to the time when the bill shall become operative. I read for the benefit of the gentleman the first proviso of the first section of the bill:

Provided, however, That this repeal shall not affect any valid rights heretofore accrued or accruing under said laws, including the right of such persons as have entered contest, to make entry of the land the subject of such contest, as now provided by existing law; and all bona fide claims, lawfully initiated upon either surveyed or unsurveyed lands before the 1st day of October, 1866—

The provision being extended for the benefit of those who may go in during the entire season, until the 1st day of October, 1886—may be perfected upon due compliance with the law in the same manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same limitation, forfeitures, and contests, as if this act had not been passed.

That is the House provision which we sent to the Senate.

Now, the next item of disagreement between us the House conferees regard as important. It is well known to those who are familiar with the public-land laws that there are vast areas of land in the country known as "offered lands;" that is to say, where land has been once offered at public auction and has not been purchased when so offered it thereafter becomes subject to what is known as private entry at $1.25 an acre, and in such quantities as the purchaser may desire to acquire. By proclamation of the President, most of the valuable lands in the Northwest have been withdrawn from that condition; but over the South and in the Southwest large areas of this land still remain. The great proportion of it is timber land, valuable only for the timber which is upon it. In anticipation of the passage of the House bill, which is in substance the same as the bill of the Senate at the last session, large areas of this land are now being taken, notably in Louisiana and Mississippi. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from one of the current newspapers showing what is being done with reference to this class of lands in the Southwest.

The Clerk read as follows:

Southern pine lands—Chicago and Michigan men have bought much of them up—A total of 1,446,300 acres purchased in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi—Yellow pine and cypress to supersede white pine—The South hereafter to be the region to which the country must look for its supply—Figures as to cost of cutting and getting to market.

[Special.]

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 9.

Louisiana and Mississippi wake up suddenly to find that Chicago and Michigan men have purchased all their best pine lands. This city has been swarming with Northern lumber barons for the last few days, who are happy over their purchase of 1,446,300 acres of Government lands at $1.25 per acre—a total of $1,800,000. Three years ago surveying parties and experts began exploring both States, locating accurately all of the long-leaf pine lands, and writing out data on their location and proximity to water and other transportation. When the information was all secured at an expense of about $15,000, the desirable lands were taken with hot haste. The lands thus purchased from the Government run 10,000 feet to the acre, and hold 15,000,000,000 feet of standing lumber.

The list of purchasers is as follows:

In the Calcasieu district Southwestern Louisiana, a Chicago syndicate, comprising Messrs. Wirt Dexter, N. K. Fairbank, F. H. Head, H. B. Perkins, and Robinson & Lacey, of Grand Rapids, Mich., have taken 100,000 acres.

The Calcasieu Lumber Company, comprising Benton Hanchett, Louis Penoyer, W. S. Green, Ezra Rust, and Mr. Harden, of Saginaw; N. B. Bradley & Sons, and B. E. Warren, of Bay City; W. C. Yawkey, E. M. Fowler, and S. Chapman, of Detroit; E. A. & E. F. Brakenridge, of New Orleans, has 130,000 acres.

Other purchasers in the Calcasieu are: Grand Rapids—Hon. C. C. Comstock, 35,000 acres; E. F. Uhl, Robinson & Lacey, and Dr. George K. Johnson, 32,000 acres; G. W. Gay, 15,000 acres; N. W. Northrop and Robinson & Lacey, 3,500 acres; A. B. Watson and Robinson & Lacey 2,800 acres; Penoyer Brothers, Oscoda, 14,000 acres; E. A. & E. F. Brakenridge (formerly of Saginaw), 20,000 acres; M. R. Gay, Detroit, 5,000 acres; Charles Winchester, Ashburnham, Mass., 16,000 acres; William E. Rice, New Jersey, 40,000 acres; Lutcher & Moore, Orange, Tex., 56,000 acres; G. E. Wasey, Detroit, 15,000 acres; Pack & Woods, Cleveland, 26,000 acres; H. Lamport, Victoria, Ont., 16,000 acres; H. & B. Biers, New Orleans, 8,000 acres; S. R. Prentiss, Oakland, Cal., 25,000 acres; Berkett & McPherson, Howell, Mich., 20,000 acres. Total, 577,300 acres.

The purchasers in the Red River district of Louisiana are as follows: Governor R. A. Alger, Detroit, 10,000 acres; G. E. Wasey, Detroit, 10,000 acres; Grattick, South & Friar, Detroit, 30,000 acres; John L. Woods, Cleveland, 64,000 acres; A. B. Watson, I. M. Weston, of Grand Rapids, and M. B. Hull, of Chicago, 18,000 acres (runs 20,000 feet to the acre); William Hake, Grand Rapids, 8,000 acres. Total, 140,000 acres.

In the northeastern district of Louisiana the purchasers are: W. D. Morley, Marine City, Mich., 40,000 acres; E. A. Brakenridge, 5,000 acres; Henry and B. D. Hamlin, Southport, Pa., and R. W. Wright, Westfield, N. Y., 45,000 acres: L. D. Wetmore, Warren, Pa., 9,000 acres; J. P. Jefferson and E. Wetmore, Warren, Pa., 8,000 acres; Charles Parmalee, Warren, Pa., 3,000 acres. Total, 110,000 acres. Total for Louisiana, 827,300 acres.

The sales in Mississippi are as follows:

Pearl River district—On the eastern bank, D. A. and J. W. Blodgett, of Grand Rapids, have 85,000 acres, which they have recently purchased of I. M. Weston and Robinson & Lacey, of the same place. They can travel forty-eight miles on a north and south line without leaving their own land. Adjoining it the Mississippi Lumber Company, comprising Joseph Heald, Grand Rapids; John C. Lewis, H. E. Staples, M. B. and C. E. Covell, and W. F. Nufer, of Whitehall, own 16,000 acres, and Adam Hafer, of the firm of Weston, Hafer & Whitehall, 5,000 acres. Lying between Pearl and Wolf Rivers, I. M. Weston, Grand Rapids; R. T. Wilson, Ogden, and Robert Goelet, of New York, own 50,000 acres; adjoining these lands, Charles Bewick, Andrew and William Comstock, and Edward Kanter, Detroit, have 100,000 acres, and B. F. Southworth 7,000 acres. Total, 263,000 acres.

On streams tributary to the Pascagoula River in Eastern Mississippi are: On Leaf River, I. M. Weston, A. B. Watson, Grand Rapids, and M. B. Hull, Chicago, 38,000 acres; Watson, Weston & Stanton, Grand Rapids, 8,000; Pascagoula Lumber Company, Grand Rapids, comprising A. B. Watson, I. M. Weston, Osterhout & Fox Lumber Company, White, Friant & Co., H. T. Stanton, O. R. Wilmarth, and E. Ware, 50,000 acres. President Watson and Treasurer Weston, of this company, are now at the mouth of the Pascagoula River locating grounds for mills and boomage. On Black and Red Creeks, Senator T. W. Palmer, Detroit, ex-Congressman Jay Hubbell, Houghton, Mich.; Col. F. B. Stockbridge, Kalamazoo; Paul Blackmar, Big Rapids; G. C. Wetherby and Mr. Randall and associates, of Indianapolis, have 90,000 acres. West of these lands, F. Henry, Warren, Pa., has 8,000 acres; Henry Hamlin, Smithport, Pa., 21,000 acres; John McEwen, Bradford, Pa., 30,000 acres; I. L. Lyon, Detroit, 5,000 acres; William Solomon, Grand Rapids, 6,000 acres; Otto Plock, New York, 100,000 acres. Total, 356,000 acres. Total for Mississippi, 619,000 acres. Total for both States, 1,446,300 acres.

Mr. PAYSON. Without reading the whole list I will ask leave to insert it. It shows in anticipation of this proposed legislation these vast areas of land are being taken up, lands worth anywhere from five to ten and fifteen dollars per acre, as soon as transportation may be furnished, so soon as they shall be made accessible, are being taken up in great quantities, 1,600,000 acres having been taken up in a few days at two offices; and while this is the condition in reference to these lands being taken up in these large quantities the House bill provided that hereafter no public lands of the United States heretofore offered for public sale, including the abandoned military and other reservations, should hereafter be taken at private entry at $1.25 per acre. The Senate take that provision, change the phraseology by inserting a word or two, so that it shall read as follows:

That hereafter no public lands of the United States not heretofore offered at public sale, excepting abandoned military and other reservations, shall be offered at public sale.

Thus leaving it open as to all lands subject to private entry and public entry to be up for sale and open to private entry.

And the evil we attempted to abate still goes on. We disagreed wholly in reference to that provision in the Senate bill.

Section 8 of the bill is another validating provision; it provides in no instance shall there be any contest in reference to any fraudulent entry of any public land unless it is instituted within nine months of the date of the entry. At first the entry was thirty days, but afterward it was thought proper to make it six months, and finally without objection it was made nine months. It goes without saying in the great territory in the extreme West and Northwest, where these areas of public lands are, contests can not be instituted; that it is practically impossible, either for special agents of the Government or those who may desire to settle on the lands out there, to reach them and institute contests within nine months of the entry.

On that question the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lamar, has also expressed himself fully in reference to it. I ask the Clerk to read his expression in reference to this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. The provision in section 8, lines 17 to 22, requiring judicial proceedings to cancel a final entry, I totally disapprove of for the following reasons: First, it is a radical departure from the letter and the spirit of all former land laws; second, it assumes that title passes out of the United States by an entry or location, whereas both the Department and the courts have almost invariably held to the contrary; third, it divests the Land Department of a jurisdiction over entries which it has always exercised, which does and of right ought to belong to it until the issue of patent, and for the exercise of which adequate quasi-judicial machinery has been or may be devised; fourth, it will provoke a multiplicity of suits, since it contemplates a complete trial in the Land Department and another in the courts, with the result of an increase of expense both to the claimant and to the Government; fifth, it will prolong controversies over the issue raised, often for several years, whereas the preliminary trial, with the appeals, must also usually consume one or more years, and it will thus tie up the land for an unnecessarily long period in the hands of persons adjudged by the Department to have entered by fraud, and to the great and often irreparable damage of other and bona fide adverse claimants; sixth, it will result in flooding the courts with the already great quantity of contested entries, whose number will be vastly augmented by the resistance of those fraudulent entrymen who now never take an appeal when their wrongdoings have been exposed; seventh, it will discourage the institution of contests, for it will create delays and finally take the conduct of the cases away from the contestants, who are under existing laws the best safeguards against fraudulent entries, which are so readily made by reason of the ex parte proceedings at final proof; eighth, it is opposed to sound policy, for the reason that the surest guarantee of bona fide settlement and entry is facility of contest, followed by a swift, sure trial, and a summary cancellation upon proof of the fraud.

I am of opinion that this provision, which would be an incentive to and a protector of fraud, should be eliminated, and that instead thereof the following provision should be inserted: "The Commissioner shall suspend the issue of patent and hold the entry or location for cancellation, with right of appeal to the Secretary of the Interior; and if appeal be not taken as prescribed by the regulations, or if the Secretary should affirm the decision of the Commissioner, the entry shall be canceled and the land and all moneys paid therefor shall be forfeited to the United States."

8. I decidedly disapprove of the provision in section 11 repealing the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Statutes, 472). Said act, by providing for public notice of intention to make final proof and entry, is almost the only check upon the consummation of secret and fraudulent claims. Its enactment was the result of long experience, and I believe it to be in every sense effective, while it is not ordinarily detrimental to the interests of persons who are acting in good faith.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, an examination of section 8 in the Senate bill will show the most casual observer that the criticisms made by the Secretary of the Interior should be respected by the House. It does not need a lawyer to determine that question. Any one upon reading the section and perusing the criticism would come to the same conclusion. It comes to the House with his recommendation backed by the experience he has had here; and I may say without any breach of confidence between him and myself that I know he has given the matter diligent attention and speaks advisedly in reference to it.

Section 8 of the Senate law provides:

SEC. 8. That in all cases under the pre-emption and homestead laws, and under this act—

Not only the homestead and pre-emption laws, but in reference to the desert-land act and the amendments here—all contests or protests on the part of the Government, or any individual, concerning the land entered, shall be instituted within nine months after final entry and issue of the duplicate receiver's receipt, and not afterward.

Then follows a proviso introducing a new provision of law, introducing a new method, a regulation, a procedure which has never obtained in the Department before:

Provided further, That after final proof of the claimant and the issuing of the duplicate receiver's receipt, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that fraud has entered into the title so acquired by the claimant, unless it shall appear that the land has been sold or conveyed to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, the Commissioner shall suspend the issuing of the patent for the same, and file with the United States Attorney-General notice of such suspension of the patent, with his reasons therefor; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to commence proceedings at once in the proper court to set aside such title, if in his judgment such proceedings can be maintained.

Recognizing, as will be seen, for the first time in the history of the public-land law, and for the government and guidance of the Interior Department, that the receiver's certificate is title as against the United States. That has never been held to be the rule before. There has never been a decision of any inferior or superior Federal court that embodied such a proposition as is contained in this provision to which I have referred; and it is proposed in this case to enact into law that the receiver's certificate is title, which can only be set aside by judicial proceedings, and taking from the Interior Department a power which it has always had since 1834, and has exercised uniformly and without question down to the present time, and which it has exercised without dispute as to its right to exercise it, namely, the power to investigate alleged frauds in the original entry after the receiver's certificate is issued and prior to the issuing of the patent. I assert that there never was a decision of a Federal court which established a contrary doctrine except in the one single individual case decided by Judge Deady in Oregon—a case which has been asserted as collusive, and it so appears, for no appeal was prosecuted.

Mr. PETERS. It has been held by the State courts that a mortgage after the final fee is paid and before the patent is issued is valid.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir, it is true; and it has been held by the Federal courts that the entryman may have the final certificate, provided the entryman came with clean hands and had done nothing inconsistent with the public land laws. Precisely the same as the condition would be of a transaction as between you and myself; I holding from you a bond for the purchase of a piece of land which had been assigned to the gentleman from Kansas, and a bill in equity would lie in his behalf for a specific performance of the contract to compel the execution of the bond as between you and me, and the question of fraud as between the contracting parties could be set up. So it has been held in reference to these land matters in the Interior Department. The provision for a mountain homestead is a new departure, uncalled-for, and we do not agree to it; but I do not take time with reference to it.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the points of difference between us. They are vital and go to the root of the whole question. If the Senate bill shall become a law you might as well stop legislation with reference to protecting the public lands as against fraudulent acquisition of title, and close the doors of the Committee on the Public Lands and shut up the General Land Office, for this would all be useless if this bill should become a law. There is no demand for it, and it is against what I regard—I do not know whether other gentlemen have noticed the fact—but it is against what I regard as the overwhelming expression of public sentiment in favor of the passage of the House bill pure and simple. The people of this country are alive to the importance of the House bill.

House bill No. 7887 has been printed in nearly every newspaper North and West; wherever there is a trades union, wherever there are Knights of Labor organizations, wherever there is a farmers' grange or any society of laboring men and industrial classes in this country efforts have been made to express sentiment and opinion, and resolutions are upon every day's record of our proceedings day after day asking us to use every exertion to secure the passage of that bill, the House bill; and I call the attention of the gentlemen about me to the fact, and doubtless there is not one who does me the honor now to listen to me who has not received petitions signed by these citizens all over the Union asking their assistance and co-operation in securing the passage of that bill. It is a matter of daily occurrence. The RECORD is filled with them. I turn to a page of the RECORD and find:

The following petitions, asking for the passage of House bill 7887, repealing the timber-culture, pre-emption and desert-land acts; of House bill 7021 for the adjustment of railroad and other land-grants; of the bill forfeiting all railroad land grants, &c.

Mr. Speaker, page after page of this RECORD is filled and day after day such petitions as that, signed by the industrial classes all over the country, may be found. Thousands upon thousands of voters of this country have taken occasion to sign the petitions and forward them here. They come from different parts of the Union, so that since the days when petitions came here from the North and East with reference to the abolition of human slavery there has never been an occasion upon which the petitions and memorials have come to this Chamber or to the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol in such numbers asking for legislation, or that compare in dignity to this.

Mr. PLUMB. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment to cite an instance that has come under my own observation?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly; I yield to my friend.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say that I hold in my hand a resolution passed by a State convention of Knights of Labor held in Illinois, in my own district, representing sixty thousand knights, and the first resolution adopted is in these words:

They ask that the public domain be reclaimed from all who hold it unjustly, and that laws be passed militating against the individual or corporate ownership of large tracts of land. Also, that the tendency of taxation shall be to discourage the holding of unprofitable lands for speculative purposes, and to encourage the return to the Government of the "unearned increment of land" sought to be obtained by such holding.

Mr. PAYSON. In glancing over the page of the RECORD before me, in reference to these petitions, I see in their order they came from Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New York again, Virginia, Maine, Maryland, Ohio, in fact all of the States. Petitions equally numerous, and representing as intelligent a class of citizens, come also to the Senate asking for the passage of House bill 7887. They ask this Congress respectfully to give them bread in the shape of the House bill, and the Senate gives them a stone by the bill proposed; a bill which will validate these frauds which stand as a stench in the nostrils of anybody who has taken occasion to investigate the subject.

I believe that is about all I care to say at present. The motion, which will doubtless be made in a moment, that the House further insists on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate ought to be voted by this House unanimously as an instruction to these conferees when another conference is appointed, that this House represents a state of opinion that ought to be and shall be respected.

Mr. PERKINS addressed the Chair.

Mr. COBB. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The first thing to be done is to accept the report.

Mr. STRAIT. The amendments have not been read to the House.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House but the conference report, reporting a disagreement, which will be accepted, and then if the gentleman from Indiana makes a motion that the House further insists on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, it will be a motion having priority to move that the House recede. On either of these motions the amendments can be read.

Mr. PAYSON. That the matter may be before the House, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. That motion has been submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB].

Mr. PERKINS. I intend at the proper time to move that the House recede from its disagreement.

Mr. COBB. I yield to my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COBB. I will allow my colleague on the committee to take the floor in his own right, and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on the first Monday in June last this House passed the bill, reported from the Committe on Public Lands, repealing the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws, and sent it to the Senate. That body returned the bill here materially changed by amendments. The House refused to concur in the amendments of the Senate, and appointed a conference committee to meet a like committee from the Senate. The representatives of the two Houses have had a conference, but failed to reach any agreement. The Senate conferees insist on retaining the bill as it passed that body, to which the managers of the House emphatically dissent. As one of the representatives of the House in that conference I desire to emphasize one or two of the objections I have to the Senate amendments, and to give some brief expression to the reasons that induce me to advise the House to adhere to its former action.

The difference between the bill as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate is broad, radical, and vital. The House bill simply repealed the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws, and the commutation clause of the homestead law, without impairing any existing vested right. The bill as amended in the Senate also repeals the pre-emption and timber-culture laws and the commutation feature of the homestead law. It does not repeal the desert-land law, but amends it. If that was all it did, if that was the only difference—though not satisfactory—we might agree to it as being better than nothing. But it goes further than that. There are some provisions in the Senate amendments that I do not think this House ought to agree to or will agree to.

The eighth section of the Senate amendments provides in substance that whenever any claimant who has made an entry under the pre-emption or homestead laws makes final proof of his entry and receives a receipt from the receiver of the proper land office, he acquires title to the land entered, and if he then sells or conveys it to a bona fide purchaser for value, no matter how dishonest or fraudulent the claim may have been, or how false the proof upon which his receipt was obtained, the title is forever gone from the Government, and the Commissioner of the Land Office has no recourse but to issue a patent, though at the time he may be conscious it is but the crowning triumph of a crime.

I imagine it would never be a difficult task for any man who would participate in perjury in order to commit larceny upon the public domain to find an "innocent purchaser." They are both numerous and accommodating. But under this section, even in the absence of a white-winged "innocent," the original claimant who has made his final proof, though every affidavit may be a lie, and who has received his duplicate receipt, no matter under what fraud or false pretense obtained, can demand his patent of the Commissioner, and the Commissioner must issue it, unless on his suggestion the Attorney-General should see proper, in the exercise of his discretion, to institute proceedings in the name of the United States to set aside the fraudulent title of the entryman. Such a statute would overturn the long-established practice of the Department, and materially change the established law of the land. As the law now stands a claimant who has entered upon land, made his final proof and got his receipt, if his claim is based upon a substantial and honest compliance with the law, has a good equitable title to his land, and a right to a patent conveying to him the legal title—which right he can enforce, if it becomes necessary, by proper proceedings in the courts. The relation existing between the claimant and the Government is analogous to that of vender and vendee, where the latter is in possession under contract of purchase, having performed on his part can enforce performance, if refused, on the part of the former. This amendment of the Senate to the pending measure proposes to reverse the existing order of things in this respect. The people of the United States have offered homes to those who need them upon the public lands of the country; but they require those who seek the benefits of this great privilege to comply with certain conditions before they can receive title to the lands. They must take the lands for the purpose of actual settlement. They must go upon the lands, cultivate, improve, and subdue them to the uses of practical agriculture. The policy of the Government is to furnish free homes to honest men. The existing laws were enacted with an especial view to prevent speculations in the public lands, or a diversion of them to any other use than that of actual settlement in strict accordance with the requirements of the law. The laws were intended to preserve the public domain as homes for the men who would brave the perils of frontier life and lay the foundations of prosperous communities and great States, and to guard them against the encroachments of that less reputable class who would seek to speculate on the bounty of the Government and build up fortunes at the expense of the people. Now, here is a proposed statute which would throw its protecting wing over the most hardened land-shark on the continent. A man who has entered or procured the entry of public lands in open fraud of the law, and whose proof of compliance with law is the rankest perjury, could demand his patent and the Commissioner would be compelled to deliver it, unless he could persuade the law officer of the Government to sue him, and that suit would have to be brought within two years after final proof, or else the fraud would be forgiven by limitation.

Mr. Speaker, I should regard such legislation as unwise and improvident, as furnishing an inducement to the commission of fraud, and as giving it, when committed, an advantage over the ways of honest men, even if it had only a prospective operation. But inasmuch as it is proposed to repeal the pre-emption law, and as the opportunity and inducement for committing frauds under the homestead law with the commutation clause eliminated would be small, it is altogether probable no great harm would result if the proposed enactment looked to the future only. But in the light of all the facts before us I have absolutely no patience with the proposition when it is proposed to give to it a retroactive as well as a prospective effect. If this Senate amendment should become the law it would practically perfect every entry heretofore made, condone every fraud, and forgive every crime committed against the existing land laws of the country.

With all due respect to those who may favor such a scheme, I can not regard it as otherwise than outrageous and scandalous. That the pre-emption laws have been enormously abused in recent years, and that gross frauds frequently on a large scale have been perpetrated by the thousands and the public domain plundered almost at pleasure, there can be no sort of doubt. The Commissioner of the General Land Office gives it as his opinion that 90 per cent. of the pre-emption and timber-culture entries made in many, perhaps a majority, of the land districts of the West are fraudulent; and that opinion is not merely a vague speculation on his part. His judgment is based on reliable information coming to him from a multitude of both private and official sources. The registers and receivers of the land offices and special agents sent out to investigate the facts alike report that great bodies of the public lands throughout the West have been taken by syndicates and speculators in bold violation of law and in fraud of the public right.

I know there are many gentlemen in both Houses of this Congress who for some reason seek to discredit these reports and to belittle and disgrace the Commissioner of Public Lands. There is not a lobbyist or land-shark in Washington who does not denounce the Commissioner, nor a filthy sheet published in their interest that is not filled with murderous assaults upon his character, and upon the floor of this House he has been subjected to a fusillade of unjust imputations, criticisms, and accusations. No one has been bold enough to assail his personal integrity. That he is a thoroughly upright and honest man both friend and foe agree. In that respect at least he is beyond the range of criticism. He has represented a constituency upon this floor with honor and distinction, and at home in the great State of Illinois—a State which falls behind no other in the intellectual and progressive character of its people—he ranks as one of the first citizens of the Commonwealth.

This is the man who has been and is being denounced for doing his simple duty as he understands it—for throwing himself across the pathway of plunderers and calling a peremptory halt. That he may be mistaken and overestimate the number of frauds that have been committed is possible; but that he is grappling with a great public evil and struggling against odds to destroy it is beyond doubt, and he ought to be encouraged and sustained by every man in this country who believes in honest methods and the enforcement of the law. What motive could General Sparks have in intentionally misrepresenting the facts with a view to deceiving the country? Such a course would argue him a scoundrel, when we all know he is an honest man. What motive could induce the sworn officers of the law, the officials in charge of the land offices, and the special agents of the Department, both Democrats and Republicans, to report the prevalency of these frauds if they do not exist? Special Agent W. H. Goucher reports from San Francisco, November 17, 1884, as follows:

> I would estimate that but 5 per cent. of the entries made under the timber-culture and desert-land laws are in good faith and with the intent of accomplishing the purposes contemplated in those acts.

Special Agent Prichard reports from Gunnison, Colo., November 29, 1884, that the frauds are in proportion to the bona fide entries as one to ten. Special Agent Jaycox reports from Aberdeen, Dak., that in his opinion—

> Not more than 30 per cent. of the land in this district entered under the provisions of the pre-emption and homestead laws is occupied by actual settlers. Fully 75 per cent. of the entries made under the provisions of the pre-emption laws are made for speculative purposes and not for a home and for cultivation.

The register and receiver at Miles City, Mont., reports substantially the same state of affairs to exist in his district, and in speaking of how the claims are proved has this to say:

> The parties who make the declarations and affidavits seldom appear at this office, but appear before the deputy clerk of the district court in this very town and make their affidavits before him. We seldom have the opportunity of questioning the parties as to the character of the land or to learn from them in what manner the company obtains control of the land, and have to rely entirely upon the papers and small maps furnished or presented.

Such is the tenor of the reports that come into the Land Office by the hundreds. These are the official reports of the sworn officers of the law, especially appointed for the purpose and charged with the duty of overseeing the public lands of the country. It is possible that many of the estimates made are exaggerated, but unless we proclaim the whole Land Office force from the Commissioner down a set of fools or knaves, there can be no escape from the conclusion that the public lands have been misappropriated on a large scale in gross violation and abuse of the law. Shall this Congress now by solemn enactment confirm, validate, and perfect these fraudulent and invalid titles, covering we know not how many hundreds of thousands, and maybe millions, of acres?

On what theory of good morals, good business, or good statesmanship can such legislation be justified. Sir, it is an outrageous and shameful proposition, and I am astounded that it finds countenance with gentlemen in this Congress whom we all esteem for their high personal and official integrity. I have heard it excused on the ground that these lands have largely passed or soon will pass into the hands of innocent purchasers and actual settlers, and that it will be better in the long run to issue the patents and let it go as it is. Such an argument would not surprise me if it came from the lips of the beneficiaries of these frauds, but it does astonish me when it comes as the deliberate judgment of men whose aim it should be to inspire respect for the law, and whose duty it is to insist upon obedience to it. The assertion that these lands, fraudulently entered, are now or soon will be in the hands of actual bona fide settlers is a purely speculative statement, and I do not believe it.

In the next place I do not believe that any man who makes a fraudulent pre-emption acquires any title, before the issue of patent, which is the subject of conveyance to the prejudice of the Government; nor do I believe there can be, in contemplation of law, any such thing as an innocent purchaser of such a claim. The law says "that every person, being the head of a family," &c., "who has made, or hereafter makes, a settlement in person on the public lands subject to pre-emption, and who inhabits and improves the same, and who has erected or shall erect a dwelling thereon" is authorized to enter a hundred and sixty acres upon paying the minimum price of such land. But before any person can claim the benefit of that law he must make oath that he has never previously exercised his right of pre-emption; "that he is not the owner of 320 acres of land in any State or Territory; that he has not settled upon and improved such land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive use; and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure in whole or in part to the benefit of any person except himself; and if any person taking such oath swears falsely in the premises, he shall forfeit the money which he may have paid for such land, and all right and title to the same."

Now, we are informed by reports from the Land Office that there are thousands of cases where men have been employed by speculators to go upon lands, erect thereon the pretense of a house, stir up a few shovelsful of dirt, and then go off and file their declarations, make the required oath and proofs, pay for the land with moneys furnished by their employers, get their duplicate receiver's receipts, and immediately transfer their claims to their employers, receiving the agreed consideration for their rascalities and perjuries. The employer, who is of course an "innocent purchaser," takes possession of the land and looks after the subsequent issue of the patent. Can the laws be thus evaded? Can the Government be defrauded and the people cheated by this sort of jugglery? Does such a proceeding vest any title in anybody? Did the pre-emptor acquire anything he could convey to his employer? His deed would be but a quitclaim at best; the title remains in the Government. The man who comes for a patent must bring a clean record, or else he may be lawfully denied.

Section 2263 of the Revised Statutes provides that "prior to any entries being made under and by virtue of the provisions" of the pre-emption law "proof of the settlement and improvement thereby required shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district," &c., "and all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured prior to the issuing of the patent shall be null and void." I maintain that a pre-emptor before the issue of a patent can pass nothing by his conveyance to the prejudice of the Government unless his entry was honestly made in compliance with the law, and that doctrine is sustained by the decisions of the Supreme Court. No, sir; I repeat, there is nothing in law, equity, or good morals that can justify or excuse this legislation which proposes to legalize rascality and offer a premium to perjury, and the proposition should be promptly and indignantly rejected by the House.

There is another proposition embraced in section 7 of the Senate amendments to which I could not agree without great reluctance and misgiving as to its wisdom. That is, the proposition to make another classification of the public lands, to be designated as "mountainous land," and to authorize the appropriation of 320 acres as a homestead. The section provides that whenever three-fourths of any 40-acre tract of the surveyed public lands is so mountainous and rough that it can not be plowed and cultivated it shall be deemed mountainous land within the meaning of the section. It is proposed therefore to give a homesteader 240 acres of land he can not cultivate, in order to induce him to accept 80 acres that he can cultivate. In the first place I do not believe the real honest homeseeker—the man who expects to reside upon the land and support his family out of the products of the soil—needs any such inducement. I can not see to what beneficial use a small mountain farmer could devote 240 acres of yawning chasms and towering mountain peaks. I can see how it is possible for men of ample means who desire to control large water fronts to realize some advantage out of such an enactment. But aside from all that, I am strongly opposed to giving away the public lands in large tracts to single individuals. There are two policies touching the disposition of our public lands which have their respective advocates upon this floor and elsewhere throughout the country. One contemplates a rapid disposition of the public domain, while the other seeks to husband and preserve it with jealous care. One is a policy for the present only, while the other, not unmindful of the present, looks down into the long future before us.

Gentlemen who live in Western States and Territories, ambitious to outstrip their neighbors and full of the dash and inspiration of Western enterprise, welcome whatever will quicken their growth, hasten their development, and increase their local prestige and importance. They are burning with anxiety to have their waste lands occupied, and grow impatient at whatever they imagine is calculated to delay their progress in this respect. I know that is very natural, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps commendable; but in so far as that progress depends on a prodigal donation of public lands as an inducement to emigration, I think it the better part of wisdom to make haste slowly in that direction. I believe the true policy of the Government should be to preserve its lands for small holdings for many people, rather than bestow them lavishly upon a few. For that reason I regard the proposed measure as an unwise one, and for the same reason have felt anxious to repeal the desert-land law, under which 640 acres may be taken by a single individual. The desert-land law affords no immediate advantage to men of small means, for no man can enjoy its benefits who has not capital enough to construct canals and ditches so as to distribute water over it and irrigate it. Those who are benefited by the law are men able to organize irrigation companies with ample capital at their back, and thus control the water privileges of the country. I know it is claimed that unless this is allowed what is called the arid or desert regions will never be redeemed, and we are told that time will eventually make all things even; that when the lands are ultimately subjected to domestic uses they will in the course of time be bought up and distributed among the masses. That may be, but I see no necessity for hurry about this. It would be far better if in the processes of time these lands could be taken up in small quantities by the masses of the people themselves as the demand for them shall arise.

I am aware it is contended that that is impracticable, for the reason that those desert lands can not be utilized for agriculture without the employment of water through expensive artificial means. That is measurably true to-day, but I believe that those conditions will gradually disappear until in the not distant future beneficent nature will shower upon the dry lands of the West whatever is necessary to make them useful and productive. Ten years ago I was familiar with Southwestern Kansas. Even then that section of that magnificent young State was regarded as a part of the great desert. Millions of acres of land were lying waste and idle, except in so far as they were used as grazing lands for cattle-herders. Occasionally some pioneer would venture out into the Southwest beyond the confines of civilization, locate a homestead, and plant a crop, which was sure to perish under the withering blight of the rainless summer, and that would be the end of him. When I first traversed that country ten years ago—eight years ago—I saw frequent evidences of those fruitless and abandoned efforts at settlement.

Whatever may have been the cause, certain it is great climatic changes have occurred in that section. The rainfall there now is amply sufficient, and as the climate is healthful, the soil fertile, and the country beautiful thousands of homeseekers have emigrated there, and it is developing into one of the most prosperous agricultural sections of the Union. As a matter of fact I know that these same changes are manifesting themselves farther to the West, and I believe, in the providence of God, the time is not far distant when the fertile plains of all the great West will be adapted by natural means to all the uses of mankind. But if that should not be, it might not be unwise for the Government itself to make the irrigation of our public lands a national work. At all events it will do no harm if we proceed only as there is necessity for advancement.

There is little of our public domain left to us outside of what is embraced in the mountain and so-called desert regions. The homes of the future must be found there if found at all. The whole world is pouring its population in upon us. We are growing too fast. Already we are unable to furnish employment to our laborers. Everywhere there is unrest and discontent. In the great centers of population we are daily confronted with evidences of social conditions and industrial disorders that excite the gravest apprehensions. It takes no prophetic eye to see the day when we must meet the dangers of an overcrowded population.

Sir, our experiment at self-government—our capacity for self-government—has never yet been put to the test. There was no question of self-government involved in our civil war. From our earliest history there had been differences of opinion as to the organic nature of our Government and the constitutional relations existing between the States and the Federal Government. Those differences were the basis of political parties and the fruitful source of political agitation. The controversies which grew up out of those antagonisms were intensified by social and industrial conditions which finally provoked a bloody and disastrous war. But at no time did anybody ever question the capacity of the American people for self-government, or consider that question at stake in the issue. But the time is fast approaching when that great crucial test will force itself upon us. Every year we add millions to our population, not only those who are born and reared in the faith of republican institutions but of those who come to us with strange notions from abroad.

In a little while we will be face to face with that dangerous problem which now confronts the older countries of the world—what are we going to do with the people? Then the test will be upon us. As long as we have public lands which we can offer as homes to these people—as long as they have some place to go and toil and live—the danger I speak of will be delayed; and when it comes, the more people we have upon farms engaged in agriculture and owners of the land the better will we be prepared to meet it. The very day a man becomes a landowner, sheltered under his own roof, with the means of living at his command, he becomes personally interested in maintaining order and preserving intact the institutions of his government.

It is in this view I say wise statesmanship urges the adoption of that policy with reference to our public lands which makes them most useful to the largest possible number, and it is because I am so deeply impressed with this conviction that I can not willingly support any measure having a contrary tendency, and for the same reason I would rejoice if the desert-land law could be obliterated from the statute-book.

These are the two chief objections I have to the Senate amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment to the first section of the House bill, and agree to the same. I ask to have it read.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill as it passed the House, as as follows:

That chapter 4 of title 32, excepting sections 2275, 2276, 2283, 2286, 2288, and section 2299 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other laws allowing pre-emption of the public lands of the United States, are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That this repeal shall not affect any valid rights heretofore accrued or accruing under said laws, but all bona fide claims lawfully initiated before the passage of this act may be perfected, upon due compliance with law, in the same manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same limitation, forfeitures, and contests as if this act had not been passed: And provided further, That any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the pre-emption law, and who has failed, from any cause, except by sale or disposal of his right thereto, to perfect title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under the homestead laws, may make a second homestead entry in lieu of the pre-emption privilege hereby repealed.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"Be it enacted, &c., That section 2299 and section 2301, and chapter 4 of title 32, excepting sections 2275, 2276, 2283, 2286, and 2288, of the Revised Statutes, of the United States, are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That this repeal shall not affect any valid rights heretofore accrued or accruing under said laws, including the right of such persons as have entered contests to make entry of the land the subject of such contest, as provided by existing law; but all bona fide claims lawfully initiated upon surveyed or unsurveyed lands before the 1st day of October, 1886, may be perfected, upon due compliance with law, in the same manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same limitation, forfeitures, and contests as if this act had not been passed; that all entries made under the pre-emption or homestead laws, on which final proof and payment may have been made and certificates issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry, and which may have been sold prior to the 9th day of June, 1886, and after final entry, to bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale: And provided further, That any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the pre-emption law, and who has failed, from any cause, to perfect title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under the homestead law, may make a second homestead entry in lieu of the pre-emption privilege hereby repealed; but this provision shall not apply to persons who shall perfect title to lands under the pre-emption or homestead laws under proceedings already initiated: And provided further, That all outstanding certificates of deposit on account of surveys heretofore issued under the provisions of sections 2401, 2402, and 2403 of the Revised Statutes, and acts supplemental thereto, shall be receivable as cash (except for fees and commissions) in the sale and disposal of public lands, at the land-offices at which such certificates are now receivable in commutation of homestead and in payment for pre-emption claims: And provided further, That all certificates heretofore issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to soldiers, or their widows, or their minor children, under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes, may be located by the original beneficiaries, their heirs, legal representatives, or assigns; and upon such location patent shall issue in the name of the locator."

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to call the attention of the House briefly to the amendments that are to be found in this first section of the Senate bill. And as it has been exceedingly fashionable of late to traduce and defame those men who are settling those prairies of the West and converting them into thriving communities, and as it has been fashionable to impugn the motives of every man who stands on this floor and who speaks for them, I desire to say briefly, so far as I am personally concerned, I have no personal interest in this bill. I do not know of a single foot of public land remaining in my Congressional district, and I have not now and never had any pecuniary or other interest with any man engaged in securing from the Government of the United States a foot of public land, and hence I have no personal or political interest in the contest growing out of the proposed report of the pre-emption and other statutes pertaining to our public domain.

But I know the importance of this legislation to the people of the West, and I am fatigued and tired of the accusations that are made here against men who are reclaiming that territory from the desert that has heretofore dominated there. And I am fatigued at the insinuations and accusations made here against men at the other end of the Capitol who have framed and brought into being these Senate amendments; men who have participated in the growth of these Western commonwealths, and who from personal experience and observation know the working of the different statutes, and the difficulties those frontiersmen have to contend with.

The Senate bill is largely the product of the Senators from those Western States who know the necessities of their people and who know the practical working of the present land laws; and to stand here to impugn their motives is, it seems to me, rather audacious at least for men who know nothing from personal experience or practical observation of that section and the working of these land laws. And I have no hesitancy in saying that I have as much confidence in their integrity and have much more respect for their intelligence than I have for the integrity or intelligence of the men who make these accusations against the settlers on those frontiers and the man who presides as Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The first amendment to which I desire to call the attention of the House is to be found in line 7 of section 1 of the Senate bill. It reserves from the operations of this bill section 2283 of the general statutes. That section pertains to the Osage trust and ceded lands. Should the House bill pass, there is no provision in it pertaining to those lands; and I desire to call attention to the fact that those lands were obtained from the Osage Indians upon condition that they should receive a dollar an acre from the Government for the lands. This Senate amendment preserves the present statute on that subject. That statute I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read, and then I shall be glad to have some gentleman here who advocates the House bill tell us why the section should not remain as a part of the public statutes of the land.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2283. The Osage Indian trust and diminished reserve lands in the State of Kansas, excepting the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township, shall be subject to disposal, for cash only, to actual settlers, in quantities not exceeding 160 acres or one quarter-section to each, in compact form, in accordance with the general principles of the pre-emption laws, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; but claimants shall file their declaratory statements as prescribed in other cases upon unoffered lands, and shall pay for the tracts, respectively, settled upon within one year from date of settlement where the plat of survey is on file at that date, and within one year from the filing of the township plat in the district office where such plat is not on file at date of settlement.

Mr. PERKINS. Those who have listened to the reading of that section will observe that under its provisions actual bona fide settlers are the only persons who can obtain a title to any of these lands, and that in consideration of the lands which they acquire by their settlement they are required to pay to the Government $1.25 per acre, and the Government is required to pay the Osage Indians $1 per acre. If that provision of law be stricken down by the action of Congress we will still be obligated to pay the Osage Indians $1 an acre for those lands, but we shall have no provision for the sale or disposition of them to actual bona fide settlers except such as may take them under the homestead law; and if the lands are taken under the homestead law, the obligation will still rest upon the Government to pay the Osage Indians the $1 per acre.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him, because I know he desires to be accurate about this.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. The section of the statutes, 2283, to which the gentleman refers, and which he says should be kept on the statute-book, is expressly reserved in the House bill. It is not affected directly or indirectly by the bill, but is expressly reserved from repeal, and the gentleman is, therefore, entirely in error in his criticism upon the Public Lands Committee. They agree with him in what he says, and have reserved that section from the operation of the repeal.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is correct in his statement, and it may be that he is, although in the hasty examination that I have been able to give the House bill, comparing it with the Senate bill, I got the impression that it repealed this section of the statutes——

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, let us understand each other. I not only may be accurate but I am accurate; for I hold in my hand a print of the bill as it passed the House, certified by the Clerk on the 7th day of June last, and the first three lines of it read: "That chapter 4 of title 32, except sections 2275, 2276, 2283," &c., thus expressly excepting section 2283 from the repeal.

Mr. COBB. It is excepted also, I think, in section 5 of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman has called my attention to that part of the House bill, I am satisfied that he is correct; but, as I have stated, I had marked that as one of the amendments, and had overlooked the fact that the exception was made in the House bill. I, of course, agree with the gentleman and with the committee that that section should not be repealed, and hence there is no objection to so much of the Senate bill as preserves that section.

The next amendment which I desire to call to the attention of the House is the one commencing on line 20 of the Senate bill, which provides that—

All entries made under the pre-emption or homestead laws on which final proof and payment have been made and certificates issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry, and which may have been sold prior to the 9th day of June, 1886, and after final entry to bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department.

All that there is in that Senate amendment is to protect the honest, bona fide purchaser in the title that he supposed he was securing from the settler of the land. It provides that where there is no adverse claim and where the land has been sold by the settler to an honest, bona fide purchaser the entry shall be confirmed and approved and the patent shall issue to the present owner. Is that wrong? Should this House become a party to any other declaration or to the assertion of any other principle? Is it to be the policy of this House? Shall this body declare that if a man, in good faith and with honest purposes, goes upon those Western prairies and buys 160 acres from the settler his purchase shall not be approved, a patent shall not be issued to him for the land so purchased?

Some one may suggest in opposition to this that the original settler may have been a fraudulent one; that he may not have conformed in all particulars to the requirements of the land laws. Concede for the purposes of the argument that that is true; should the honest, bona fide purchaser suffer in consequence? The Senate amendment does not propose to protect those who were parties to the fraud, if frauds were practiced. It proposes only to protect the honest, bona fide purchaser,

The declaration is that where there are no adverse claims originating prior to entry, or where the land has passed into the hands of honest, bona fide purchasers prior to the 9th day of June of the present year, the entries shall be confirmed, and in the course of time the patent shall issue to such bona fide purchaser.

If that is not to be the law, if some other practice is to be inaugurated and justified by this body, what will be the result? Will this body become a party to the wrong that might be practiced, the great injury that might be done to the honest purchaser, if after he has invested his money in the land, has moved upon it and taken possession of it, all his right is to be stricken down, all his interests destroyed, his home taken from him, because, forsooth, the original occupant, in the judgment of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was not there in good faith and for honest purposes?

If, in the judgment of the Commissioner, the original occupant was not there in good faith and for honest purposes and did not conform to every technicality of the land laws, his entry is to be set aside, the purchaser in good faith is to be stricken down; and for what purpose? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] may suggest, for the purpose of permitting an honest occupant to go upon the land. But there is an honest occupant there now; there is a man there who has invested his money in good faith and is doing what he can for the cultivation of the soil. He it is who by the Senate amendment is to be protected and only he.

This is an important amendment, and one which, it seems to me, if we desire to do justice, should be ratified and adopted by the unanimous declaration of this House. If that is not to be the law, then, as I suggested a moment ago, what is to be the effect? Shall it be the law of this land that some one seeking a home upon the public domain may come along and settle upon the 160 acres of land which a man has purchased in good faith, upon which he has established a home, which he has been cultivating, and in which at the purchase and since he has invested his money?

Shall all that be taken from him by a settler who has not invested a dollar and who has no prior right? Yet that will be the effect if the Senate amendment is not accepted, because it is the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that if the original occupancy was wrongful or unlawful, if the law was not conformed to in all its vigor, then the purchaser in good faith gets nothing by the investment of his money, and his right can not be recognized by the subsequent action of the Land Office. The Senate amendment is one which I submit should secure the commendation and approval of this House.

Another of the Senate amendments provides:

That all outstanding certificates of deposit on account of surveys heretofore issued under the provisions of sections 2401, 2402, and 2403 of the Revised Statutes, and acts supplemental thereto, shall be receivable as cash (except for fees and commissions) in the sale and disposal of public lands, at the land offices at which such certificates are now receivable in commutation of homestead and in payment for pre-emption claims.

Under the sections of the Revised Statutes mentioned in that Senate amendment certificates have issued to men who organized themselves into bodies or companies and deposited money for the purpose of securing a survey of the public lands.

Mr. PAYSON. It may save time for me to state to the gentleman that there is no disagreement beeween the House and the Senate conferees with reference to that provision.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, that is one of the Senate amendments; and I ask that the Senate amendments to this entire section shall be ratified by this House. As I understand now from the gentleman from Illinois, he consents that the House should accept that amendment. It is an important amendment, because, as I was about to suggest, settlers who go in advance of the surveyor, in advance of railroads, in advance of civilization, find themselves occupying public lands not surveyed, and they organize themselves into little bodies or parties and deposit money to meet the expenses of surveying their lands, and upon such deposit certificates are issued to them.

In the bill as passed by the House no provision is made for them; no protection is given to them. The Senate in considering these questions found it proper and deemed it necessary to make some provision for them; and I am glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois say that in the judgment of the Committee on Public Lands of this House that amendment is a good one.

Another amendment embraced in the first section is:

That all certificates heretofore issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to soldiers, or their widows, or their minor children, under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes, may be located by the original beneficiaries, their heirs, legal representatives, or assigns; and upon such location patent shall issue in the name of the locator.

As the bill passed the House, no provision of this kind was made. I do not know whether in the judgment of the Committee on Public Lands this amendment should be accepted or not. It is embraced in the first section of the bill as passed by the Senate, which I ask shall be accepted by this body as a substitute for the first section of the bill as passed by the House. Under the section of the Revised Statutes here indicated, certificates have issued to soldiers, their widows, or minor children, and being thus held, they should be validated and protected by this great Government; yet if the House bill is to be adopted as the law of the land, if this House is to persist in non-concurrence in the Senate amendments and the bill is to be enacted as passed by the House, no provision is made for this worthy class; and it must stand as the settled policy of this House that these soldiers, their widows and orphans, are not deserving of consideration or protection at the hands of this body. If that is the position in which this House is to place itself, I do not desire to take from it the credit or the glory of such legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I shall perhaps have occasion to speak of the other provisions of the bill as this discussion proceeds; but I desire now in connection with this first section to yield twenty minutes to my colleague [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, no one can condemn more severely than I do the acquirement of any portion of our public domain by cattle syndicates or by aliens. If I had the power I would prevent any alien from owning a foot of land in the United States. I believe the time is coming, even if it is not now at hand, when every foot of land we possess will be required for the use and occupation of our own population.

So that when persons get up here and say that those who are opposed to the passage of the House bill, are favoring large corporations and aliens, are favoring the giving of any portion of our public domain to aliens or cattle syndicates, they are mistaken at least so far as I am concerned.

I wish now to call the attention of the House for a few moments to what I consider one of the crucial matters connected with this bill. I care not what may be said in relation to the amount of land which has been held by these cattle syndicates or by these aliens for cattle ranches, not one foot of it can be held under the Senate bill.

Let me refer to the affidavit required to be made by the pre-emptor. I will only refer to that portion of the section of the Revised Statutes which particularly bears upon the point I am about to make, that is section 2262, one of the sections which is repealed by the proposed bill.

Section 2262 provides:

Before any person claiming the benefit of this chapter is allowed to enter lands, he shall make oath before the receiver or register of the land district in which the land is situated that he has never had the benefit of any right of pre-emption under section 2259; that he is not the owner of 320 acres of land in any State or Territory; that he has not settled upon and improved such land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive ute; and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure in whole or in part to the benefit of any person except himself.

That is the substance of the affidavit which the pre-emptor must make before he can enter upon and obtain a quarter-section of land under the pre-emption law.

How is it claimed these cattle companies obtain title? It is well known to those familiar with these matters that a man sends his herder out to settle on 160 acres of the Government land. He furnishes him with the money to make the entry and prove it up. He lives on it for six months. He is furnished with the money to make payment with the understanding after he obtains title to it, that he shall transfer it to the party who furnished him with the money. Is there any man who will say that an alien obtaining a quarter-section of land in that method, can obtain a valid title as against the Government? I assert he has no title, that it is not worth the paper upon which it is written if the officers of the Land Office do their duty. Under the amendment proposed by the Senate bill, a title obtained under such circumstances is absolutely null and void.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Suppose this bill passes?

Mr. PETERS. I say if this bill passes the title of such a man is not worth anything, because he is not a bona fide purchaser and can not be. He can not claim to be a bona fide owner when he has sent his herder to go upon the public land, make an entry, and prove it up. Is there any court in Christendom, though a land court, which would hold he was a bona fide purchaser?

I beg you to notice in the Senate bill, in line 20, first section, it is provided:

That all entries made under the pre-emption or homestead laws on which final proof and payment may have been made and certificates issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry, and which may have been sold prior to the 9th day of June, 1886, and after final entry—

To whom?

to bona fide purchasers—

And for what?

to bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale.

Title is to be confirmed simply to bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration. Everybody else is cut out. The cattle syndicate is cut out. Every man who is a speculator is cut out. He can not be a bona fide purchaser, for the Senate amendments say he must not only be a bona fide purchaser, but he must be a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. The whole matter is placed under the control and jurisdiction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office will take care that the man who is not a bona fide purchaser obtain no title under this law? Mark the language of the proposed law. It says:

Shall be confirmed and patented upon satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale.

What kind of sale? Why, sale to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. And unless it is shown to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or "of the Land Department" are the words used here, that it was for a valuable consideration, and that the sale was made to a bona fide purchaser none of the provisions of this act apply and no title passes.

Unless that proof is made to the Land Department all provisions of law in relation to ferreting out of fraud, just as they now exist, will continue in force. The Land Commissioner can under that act send out his detectives, examine the condition of the public lands, look into the question wherever fraud is supposed to exist, and can suspend the entries and refuse to issue patents if fraud shall be discovered.

You will see, then, Mr. Speaker, that under the Senate amendment it is only the bona fide purchaser, it is only the innocent and honest pre-emptor that is protected, and the land rascal, the land-shark, the land speculator is the one that is punished by the Senate amendment.

There is the difficulty with the House bill. It punishes the innocent man with the guilty. It takes the pre-emptor, who in good faith entered upon a quarter-section of land, complied with all the provisions of law, improved his claim, obtained a final receipt, and paid his money, and puts him upon the same footing, subject to the same penalty, subject to the same peculiar delays, annoyances, and expensive litigation, that it does the land-shark, the land speculator, or the alien who is trying to obtain a ranch. It is to that provision I object. I am willing that every man who has obtained land for the purpose of getting a cattle ranch and who has obtained it fraudulently shall be deprived of it.

I want him to be deprived of it. I want every quarter-section of that land to go to the pre-emptor who complies with the law honestly and in good faith. I want the honest pre-emptor rewarded and the dishonest pre-emptor punished, but I will not quietly submit to have the honest pre-emptor, who has entered upon land in good faith and complied with the law, placed in the same category as the dishonest pre-emptor who has possession of the land but who has never complied with the law, or with the dishonest purchaser who is an accessary to the attempt to defraud the Government.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that it may be difficult sometimes to tell who the honest purchaser is. May it not be well to say that it shall be to the honest purchaser and settler also, so as to combine the two.

Mr. PETERS. He can not be an honest settler if he does not comply with the law.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. The statute says purchaser, not settler.

Mr. PETERS. And it is not necessary for the purchaser that he should be a settler, because he purchases from the settler. But let me illustrate this point: Suppose you go upon a piece of land I will say with the intention of complying with the pre-emption law so as to get the title, and that you had, as you thought or pretended to think, complied with the pre-emption law and attempted to sell that pre-emption tract to another man. Would that man buy it without looking at it to see whether you had complied with the law or not? What would he do? He would go and look at the land; he would see whether you had built upon it, whether you had made certain improvements upon it required by the law, if he was a business man. If he was a man who desired to protect himself he would undoubtedly make careful examination, and if he could see that you had not complied with the law and purchased with his eyes open with full knowledge of those facts, could it be claimed that he was a bona fide purchaser? Would he be entitled to the claim with full knowledge of the fraud that you had committed upon the Government? Such a person would not be a bona fide purchaser.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But the idea is that the purchaser himself should become a settler upon the land. That would be a protection.

Mr. PETERS. But that is not the idea of the law.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman whether in the case he suggests where the person did not exercise that business caution and by his carelessness, without going upon the land to see whether the pre-emptor had complied with the law or not he had made the purchase, whether the Senate amendment protects him?

Mr. PETERS. It does not.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. For of course it might be a case of collusion between the parties, and that is what I had in mind in asking the question.

Mr. PETERS. If there was collusion between the pre-emptor and the purchaser to defraud the Government, then such purchaser would not be protected by the bill. He would not be a bona fide purchaser within the meaning of the law.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The question of collusion might exist where the purchaser did not choose to exercise that caution which ought to be exercised in regard to the compliance with the law on the part of the pre-emptor; and I wanted to know, in a case where the purchaser declined from any motive to determine whether or not the pre-emptor had complied with the law, whether he would be protected by the Senate amendment?

Mr. PETERS. That, of course, is a question which the courts would have to pass upon, being a question of law and depending upon the facts in the case. I believe if the purchaser was guilty of such gross negligence; if the fraud of the settler was apparent; if the purchaser had not taken any pains to see whether there had been a compliance or not, his ignorance might be of such a character that he could not be regarded as a bona fide purchaser.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Would he not get his patent from the Land Office? Would the burden of proof be on the Land Office to show whether he had been in collusion or not? Suppose the pre-emptor goes on and does not comply with the law, and, after having partially complied with the law sells to a man, and that man does not investigate the fact, but takes the receipt, or whatever title the pre-emptor had, who goes to the Land Office to get the patent. Is it not the purchaser who gets the final receipt?

Mr. PETERS. Oh, no; it is the settler. He must make the proof to the Land Office of having complied with the law and he must make that proof before he can sell. He can not sell before he gets the final receipt. He may, but it is in violation of law and the sale would be invalid.

But in order to obtain this final receipt the pre-emptor must make certain proof that he has complied with the law; that he has made certain improvements; and all that proof must be made to the land offices, and they must pass on the question and determine whether he has complied with the law. They take the proof and send it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And then this law says if this proof is satisfactory to the Land Department it is all right, but if not satisfactory then the entry can be suspended.

There is one other provision to which I desire to call attention. That is in connection with the eighth section. The eighth section provides that nine months after the issue of the final receipt—it is not title; some gentlemen in arguing this question have spoken of it as title; it is simply prima facie evidence of a man's right to a title, that is all—within nine months of the issuance of this final receipt, that is, within nine months after he has made all the proofs required by the local land office of compliance with the law, all protests must be made and contest instituted, otherwise they can not be instituted after that. Now, that is nothing more than right and fair. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] says it would be impossible to do this. It requires at least six months living on the land before the pre-emptor can obtain title under that law; then it requires the nine months, which make fifteen months that that title is under inspection by the neighborhood. At any time within that period it may be brought to the attention of the local land office, of the Land Department, or to the attention of anybody, and anybody can file a protest against that man's obtaining a title to that land. Certainly that period of fifteen months gives ample time, and to extend it longer is an injustice to the man who honestly goes upon the land and endeavors to obtain title under the pre-emption law.

Mr. STRUBLE. Does not very much depend on the quality of the land as to that being sufficient time—whether it is desirable on the part of others to seek it?

Mr. PETERS. It does to some extent.

There is one other provision to which I desire to call attention, the provision arraigned so severely by one of the gentlemen who have spoken, I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]. It is that which provides that all these proceedings shall be instituted by the Attorney-General in the United States courts. Now, what are the facts in relation to these contests before the land offices? They are as expensive as a trial would be in the United States district court, because these men who pre-empt the lands are not in the vincinity of the land office; they are often many miles distant from it; they are often required to go many miles and take their witnesses many miles to reach the land office, and have to bear all the expenses incident to a contest of that kind before the local land office; and the contest before the local land office settles nothing, because an appeal is almost always taken to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and very frequently from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, involving a large and enormous bill of expenses. The final decision can only be obtained by an appeal to the highest authority, the Secretary of the Interior.

It would be less expensive therefore to have the proceedings to determine the right to the land instituted in the United States court, where judgment will be final.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield my colleague four minutes more.

Mr. PETERS. There is another fact about it in this connection to which I desire to call attention. These land officers, the register and the receiver, take the proofs in all these contested cases. They are not usually lawyers, and their judgments as to the questions of law and questions of fact involved, as I said before, are not considered of such value that they are final.

But if these proceedings are instituted in the United States district court, then the party who is contesting knows he will have an able and an efficient judge to pass upon the question of law and that he will have a jury of his countrymen to pass upon the questions of fact, neither of which he has in the land office. And wherever a man has gone upon a piece of land and complied with the law honestly and faithfully, where his very home is at stake, he is entitled to have his right to that land tried before a judge who is versed in the law and before a jury of his peers.

It is nothing more than fair and just. Therefore I claim that upon the question of expense, as well as upon the question of justice and right, the provision that all of these proceedings should be instituted in the United States courts is a proper one and constitutes a weighty argument in favor of the Senate amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to impugn the motives of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is his public acts and the matters that are of record in his bureau, so far as they are connected with this bill, with which I desire to deal. We are told by those who are opposed to the adoption of the Senate amendments to the House bill that the purpose of the House bill is to prevent frauds upon the public domain. We are told that the repeal of the pre-emption and the timber-culture laws is essential to prevent frauds upon the public domain. Now, this pre-emption law has been in existence nearly half a century. It is true that it has not at all times required settlement and continued evidence in order to perfect a title under it, but so far as the law is concerned, and so far as acquiring title under the law in some form is concerned, that right has been extended to the people for a great many years, and a great portion of the West has been settled under its provisions.

Mr. Speaker, in what manner does the exercise or attempted exercise of rights under these laws permit fraud to enter into the acquiring of titles under them? Our friends tell us that the fraud is perpetrated in the matter of settlement, alleging settlement when there is in fact none. It occurs to me that whatever fraud enters into the acquiring of title to the public domain under these laws comes through the procedure under the laws in making proof of settlement or compliance with them. Now, what is that procedure? What sort of proof do parties introduce when they wish to acquire titles under these laws, and where and how are those proofs taken? They are taken before persons who are appointed without any regard to their knowledge of judicial rules or of the rules which determine the weight to be given to evidence. The same proof is presented before another tribunal upon appeal or review, and what is the result there? What sort of a tribunal or board is it, and how is it constituted? I charge it upon the General Land Office, without fear of successful contradiction, that there is an absolute lack of discrimination between the honest and the dishonest settler or claimant.

Look at the record of appeals from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, and look at the reversals of the decisions of the Commissioner. Why, sir, the cancellations of final proofs made by the General Land Office and overruled or suspended upon appeal are in the proportion of three honest to five dishonest claims. What other Department, judicial or otherwise, could stand a moment with that record? It is unnecessary, I say, to impugn the motives of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is sufficient for us to know that either the laws by which the rights of claimants and others are determined are either miserably defective or else many of the officers charged with the administration of these laws are miserably incompetent. One thing is beyond dispute, the decisions of the General Land Office are scoffed at and looked upon with contempt by nearly all parties who are acquainted with its practice and work. It certainly does not possess the confidence of the litigants whose matters are there determined.

If there is any defect in these laws as to the manner of acquiring title to the public domain, then correct the law and correct the procedure, but do not slander and vilify the honest settlers who are attempting to comply with the law. Mr. Speaker, I say again that there is an utter lack of distinction or discrimination between the rights of the honest and the dishonest settler in the General Land Office, and the intention of the Senate amendment is to settle and determine the rights of these settlers and claimants and put an end to that useless, nonsensical litigation with which these claimants are burdened before securing their rights. That is the purpose of the amendment. These gentlemen tell us that the issuance of patents should be stopped, that no patents should issue at all. I believe this was recommended in one of the communications read, why should not the honest settler receive his patent? Why should he be forced to have his rights determined by a tribunal which can not, as we know from the records, safely be trusted to weigh evidence or to determine the rights of parties in these cases?

I probably represent as many people who are interested in these questions as any gentleman upon this floor, and I know the sentiments of those people. I know the hardships they have undergone in reference to this matter. I say it is the purpose of the Senate amendments to determine and to settle these cases under and in accordance with the rules of law, by courts that are competent to hear and weigh the evidence that is introduced in these contests and cases of final proof. This is the purpose of the Senate amendment, and it is one that should commend itself to every person who desires to secure title to any portion of the public lands, or who desires to see the rights of settlers upon the public domain protected. It is proposed to determine the differences between the party seeking to obtain title and the Government in a court of justice, the decisions of which parties have some respect and in which they have some confidence. If the Government desires to set aside a title after final proof and before a certain lapse of time, let it come into court and do it the same as private parties in like cases. Let it begin its action; then cite its witnesses, bring them into court, and have the weight of their testimony passed upon by that tribunal and under the established rules of evidence.

What is the rule or procedure when a party desires to obtain title to a portion of the public domain? He has to advertise his intention of making final proof in certain newspapers that are prescribed by the officers of the local land office. That notice goes forth to the world. It is furnished to the officers of the Government. It is furnished to other persons who desire to contest or object to the proof and, even after the proof is taken, months elapse within which time contestants may file their contests or objections to this final proof. This is a complete answer to the argument that a fraudulent proof may be made without notification to the Government and parties who desire to object to it. Ample notice is given to the Government and to all parties of the time and place when the proof will be taken, that they may appear and object if they choose.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman will permit me to say that the Senate amendment abrogates the very provision which he is now indorsing, and by a repeal of that provision of the law provides that no such publication need be made in any newspaper.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is not a provision of law; it is a rule of the Department.

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir; it is a provision of law, to which I will refer the gentleman before he sits down. Section 11 of the bill as passed by the Senate repeals that provision which the gentleman is now indorsing.

Mr. GIFFORD. Well, if I have understood correctly, it is a rule of the Department, and the Department is daily making rules in reference to matters of this kind. At one time it allowed parties to make their proofs before ministerial officers, such as clerks of courts, &c. Now the party desiring to make final proof must appear in person before an officer of the General Land Office. The rules in reference to these matters have varied repeatedly during the last fifteen years, since my attention has been called to them.

But the simple fact is, that the Senate amendments in their purpose and scope seek to change the procedure under existing law so as to determine more fully the respective rights of honest and dishonest claimants.

So far as the notice required to be given by parties desiring to make proof is concerned and the statute governing it they are excellent provisions and I am opposed to the repeal of the statute. But what the settler justly complains of is, that after he fully complies with the law, bears the burden and expense incident to making proof, then he feels that his title is far from being safe. No matter how sufficient and complete may be his evidence, his proof is liable to be canceled years after it is made, and himself, heirs, or assigns put to the expense and annoyance of employing counsel and conducting an appeal. The claimant seldom has confidence in the board or tribunal which passes upon and decides his case.

The experience of thousands upon thousands forces every claimant to the above conclusion.

This is a notorious fact beyond dispute. It is these defects and these evils in our land system which the Senate amendments are designed in part to correct.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] have expired. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] is still entitled to the floor for thirteen minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] for eight minutes.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, the misfortune of this debate seems to be that it expends itself principally upon the charge and countercharge of fraud alleged to exist in the suspected Territory and does not bring up a discussion of the provisions of the bill. I desire to make one suggestion to gentlemen who hold that the entire section of country represented by the Western members here is penetrated and poisoned with fraud. It ought to be true, if fraud exists, that there should be some visible motive for that fraud. Take the State of Nebraska, and the supposition advanced is that the motive for fraud rests in the desire of the cattle-men to acquire title to land. Let us examine that in the light of the facts which surround these men.

In the first place, to acquire title to land by anything like a compliance with the provisions of the law costs the cattle-man or any other man in that State or any like country twice as much as it will cost him to acquire title to land by purchase from a railway company. This proposition is equally true in Kansas, Dakota, or any State or Territory in the neighborhood of the great railway grants. Land embraced within the grant of the Union Pacific Railway can be purchased to-day for $1.75 an acre. The first cost of land from the Government is $1.25 an acre; and this land is no better in point of quality, no better in location with respect to a railroad. Now, what motive is there for a man to blacken himself with perjury, to conspire against the laws, when he can without any trouble as to lapse of time and compliance with the provisions of the law in respect to settlements walk over upon a railway grant and buy the entire tract, if he wants it, for $1.75 or $2 an acre. I undertake to say that the title of land can not be acquired from the Government for so low a price as it costs to acquire title to the same character of land from a railway company that is within the region of the railway grants.

One other thing: Gentlemen labor under the supposition that the cattle syndicates, as they are called, have entered into a great conspiracy to commit robbery of the public domain. Let us see. Gentlemen who are at all acquainted with the West understand it to be true that in the region of agricultural lands so soon as the lands are suitable for agricultural purposes that is the high-water mark of the possibility of their being available for grazing purposes. The moment the land is available for agricultural purposes there is such a rainfall as leaves no substance in the grasses upon which the cattle must maintain themselves, and that area is marked by a change in the nature of the grasses; instead of the buffalo-grass you have the blue-stem and the blue-joint; and when that day has dawned the business of the cattle-men in that country is done. That is now the case in the State of Nebraska.

Now, if these frauds exist, if that whole country is rotten and honeycombed with fraud, how happens it that by the report of your Commissioner of the Land Office there were investigated up to the time of making his annual report in 1885 only sixty fraudulent entries out of thirty-seven thousand six hundred and eighty entries made in that State? In view of this showing, how comes it that gentlemen stand here and condemn that section and bundle off the whole body of citizens as frauds and thieves, although we are confronted by the fact appearing of record in the report made by the special agent of the Land Office that taking the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, the frauds in one State are I think double, and in the other more than equal, those charged against my own State.

Now, what is under consideration here? A provision, or series of provisions, of law which will make it possible some time to quiet the title of these settlers. Is there any gentleman on this floor who is opposed to a state of things which will make it possible for these settlers some time to acquire the right to use their own property? That is the question which is now put to Congress, as I understand. The controlling provision of the Senate bill is that when two years shall have elapsed after the issuance of the receiver's receipt upon the final entry of any tract of land under the homestead or pre-emption laws or under this act, and when there shall be no pending contest or protest against the validity of such entry, the entryman shall be entitled to a patent for the land by him entered, and such patent shall be issued to him. Is there any gentleman on this floor who is opposed to the proposition that after the lapse of two years, during which there shall have been opportunity to rake this country back and forth for the discovery of fraud, if no protest or contest shall then be found to exist against the man's title he shall be allowed the privilege, which belongs to him as a matter of law already under the decisions of all the courts, of having his patent?

I certainly trust, speaking for the interest of the settlers of the West as I know them to exist, the amendments offered by the Senate will be adopted by the House.

Mr. COBB. Has the gentleman from Kansas finished?

Mr. PERKINS. Not yet. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] desires to be heard on the third section; and, if there be no objection I will reserve the time remaining to me to yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. We have not yet got to the third section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has only four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PERKINS. I am willing to vote on the second section with the understanding I shall reserve my time to yield it to the gentleman from Wyoming on the third section.

Mr. COBB. No further time is to be taken up.

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield with that understanding.

Mr. COBB. I now desire to yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. PAYSON. If there be no objection I should like to make a correction. I stated when the gentleman from Dakota had the floor he was in error in regard to the Senate bill, and I cited him to a provision in section 11 to show that the Senate bill provided for the repeal of the statute he was advocating, and he insisted I was mistaken.

The repealing section to which I referred is as follows:

SEC. 11. That an act entitled "An act to provide additional regulations for homestead and pre-emption entries on public lands," approved March 3, 1879, and section 2 of an act entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States," approved June 15, 1880, are hereby repealed.

I hold in my hand chapter 192 of the Statutes at Large, in the first session of the Forty-fifth Congress, which statute is the statute to which the gentleman from Dakota refers and which he favors, and which section 91 of the Senate bill repeals. Upon my showing him this statute he agrees with me that he was mistaken and that my statement was accurate.

Mr. COBB. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. I regard this bill as a part of other pending legislation on the land question. There are, as everybody knows, two other important bills in relation to the public lands. One in regard to opening up to settlement the Oklahoma Territory, and the other to the settlement of the great Sioux reservation. I wish to say as one member of this House in reference to this great question of public lands that I think it would be well advised not to give way in favor of opening these immense tracts of the best remaining public territory until we have perfected our land laws in reference to the settlement of the public domain.

Mr. GIFFORD. So far as the great Sioux reservation is concerned it is provided it shall only be opened to settlement under the homestead law.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And the Oklahoma bill provides five years' actual settlement.

Mr. MCADOO. We should not open these large tracts of the public lands so long as we have upon the statute-book laws which according to the report of gentlemen who have investigated the subject have been the cover of immense frauds. That great frauds have been perpetrated under the timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land laws is, I think, proven. I think the great Indian reservations are to-day answering a useful purpose in preventing the near approach of land famine. It is the misfortune of the gentlemen who represent the section where these frauds have been perpetrated that impartial witnesses are against them. The extraordinary article of Mr. Gill, a member of the British Parliament, which has been frequently quoted in this House, shows that these laws have been made the vehicle by speculators, land-sharks, and land-grabbers to take great portions of the public territory dishonestly as against bona fide settlers, as against American citizens and in favor of British subjects and other aliens. Mr. Gill in his article speaks of the effect of the laws under discussion, as follows:

The grip of the money-lender is fast on the American farmer. His gilt legend, "Loans," strikes the eye with too significant frequency in every Western town. Who own these wasting farms that you noticed during your day's ride, with their bleak frame shanties, through whose unglazed windows the prairie wind sings? Ask the land agent, who is almost invariably the person that transacts loans and who unrolls before you a list of "improved" farms in which he recommends you to invest rather than in the virgin soil. He owns them. What has become of their former proprietors? "Oh, various things; they were a shiftless lot for the most part; some went back East again and became tenant-farmers; others moved farther west and pre-empted new land; some quit the country in the middle of the night when an interest was coming due—ran away from their honest debts, the rascals!"

Others—but of these he omits to tell you—signed an agreement in his office, the same day they filed their pre-emtion entry, to hand over to him for a sum of money the title to their homestead as soon as it was perfected according to the statute; it is one of the many ways of defrauding the nation of its public domain and throwing "improved" farms upon the market. In towns like Kansas City, Omaha, Sioux City, and Saint Paul; and even in towns no bigger than Worthington, Minn., there are publications specially devoted to advertising "improved" farms for sale.

During the entire discussion of these bills we have had elaborate defense delivered of the pioneer and the original settlers, as if we were assailing them, whereas, if Mr. Gill is right, those men who braved the savage and the storm and the terror of the wilderness and all the difficulties and hardships of pioneer life have been left to the tender mercies of the loan agent, who soon, under infamous bargains and usury, entered into possession of their claims to sell them to those who occupy them to-day. In other words, a great number of the enterprising people of the older States as well as immigrants from Europe go out upon this virgin soil, go out into the new Territories, exist as long as they can, toiling, braving, saving, slaving, and enduring, until finally the loan agent strikes them down with the shylock provisions of his blood-sealed bond, and the land they have improved, as it were with sacrifice of blood and tears, goes into the magnificent lists of improved farms for sale until the man comes along for speculation, profit, or settlement, and with the cash in his pocket to make the purchase, and he takes it up and holds the land they have redeemed at so much sacrifice from the savage and the wilderness.

Mr. PETERS. Does not the gentleman from New Jersey know that all such titles are perfectly fraudulent and good for nothing; that they have no value whatever, and are not worth the paper they are written on?

Mr. MCADOO. I am not talking of the titles.

Now, Mr. Speaker, every law on the statute-book that keeps a great public domain out of the market until we can perfect the land laws of the country is a great blessing to the people of the United States. I am glad that the Indian Territory exists for this reason. We no longer need stimulative legislation to induce settlement. We must call a halt; repeal and enact new laws to meet changed conditions. We can bar up now rather than let down.

I am glad that the great Sioux reservation, useless as it is to the Indians, is kept out from settlement and is still a part of the heritage of the American people. Let us repeal these laws unconditionally as they passed the House. The honest people of this land who are not biased by local circumstances favor this bill as it passed the House.

No appeals came to this House against this bill, but the yeomanry of the land, the honest, toiling masses of the United States, are sending up myraids of petitions, signed by thousands of enterprising, honest citizens on behalf of the repeal of these laws as the bill passed the House. The House will be unjust to itself and dishonest to the interests of the people of the United States if there is a single recession on this question.

In my limited time I simply want to close by saying this: that it is my honest and sincere conviction that one hundred years from now, if the public domain is not saved, if farmer tenancy be not discouraged, if the land grants to these powerful syndicates be not stopped, if alien ownership be not abolished, the same question will be asked in the United States that is now being asked by the great land reformers in England, namely, how came these men to occupy this vast possession of territory? Who peopled this great continent with serfs and tenants? Joseph Kay, esq., of Trinity College, Cambridge, one of the ablest writers upon the important questions of land reform in England, looking at the handful of men in possession of the lands of England, Ireland, and Scotland, asks this very pertinent question:

It would be a most interesting subject of inquiry, had we only the means of following it out, to ascertain how each of the great estates came to be formed. How many were created by the industry and persevering efforts of some ancestor; how many were the grants of sovereigns to their favorites; how many were gradually amassed by successive marriages of convenience; how many were obtained by ambitious statesmen in the troublous times of our rough island story by the attainder and death of rivals; how many were either created or immensely increased by grants of immense possessions of the religious houses and of the Roman Church; how many were the results of our fierce and bloody civil wars and struggles? It would indeed be a curious and instructive study.

But they exist, and no one wishes to interfere with the just rights of property. The only question we all desire to have answered is, is it for the common weal that the laws which affect land, and which, as I and many others affirm, have the same effect here that similar laws used to have on the Continent of Europe, namely, to keep the land tied up in great tracts and to prevent it from going into the market as much as it otherwise would do—should be retained upon the statute-book of Great Britain and Ireland?

"Just rights of property," indeed! Let us see to it that no such unjust rights of robbery ever find a foothold in our own fair land. An evil institution like land robbery comes in time to be backed by all the social, commercial, and political forces of the stricken and enervated state, and a slight profit of the evil system too often wins the voice of press, forum, and even pulpit, as now seen in Great Britain, defying the mighty genius of the great and brave Gladstone to clip it of its most offending portions.

Mr. OATES. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. Is there not a marked difference in the manner in which the large landed estates have been accumulated in Great Britain as compared with this country? There, by the law of primogeniture, the land descends from father to son; and in this country, as a rule, the larger estates on the death of the original proprietors are divided.

Mr. MCADOO. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. There will, of course, be under our institutions a vast difference in the processes by which these estates will arise. They will not have the same conditions, owing to the fact that, thank Heaven, we have no primogeniture and feudal-entailment laws. But they are drifting toward corporations, which are immortal, as the gentleman from Alabama knows, though they have no souls, and the same object will be attained; and that great blessing which the immortal Jefferson secured when he and his friends hastened, as they did in Virginia as the gentleman will remember, to ingraft upon the statutes of that State as the very first fruits of the Revolution the suppression of the feudal system and the laws of primogeniture, will be lost to the American people and imperial estates passed over to these great corporations, which will acquire them for base purposes at variance with our institutions and contrary to the best interests of the people of this country.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 8023) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the municipalities of Menominee, Mich., and Marinette, Wis., over the Menominee River; and

A bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and to define the duties of general-service clerks and general-service messengers in the Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 2800) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers by the Ohio Valley Railroad Company.

REPEAL OF PRE-EMPTION AND OTHER LAND LAWS.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PERKINS] said he had four minutes, which I understood he wanted to yield to one of his friends.

Mr. PERKINS. I reserve what time remains to me so that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] may take the floor in his own right to speak to a motion with reference to the sections from 3 to 8.

Mr. COBB. I would rather not extend the debate so far as that.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the gentleman that his side has occupied considerably more than ours. We will be content with twenty minutes more I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming, however, desires to discuss another proposition in reference to amendments which have not yet been reached. If there be no objection he can now do so.

Mr. COBB. I will resume the floor when the gentleman from Wyoming gets through.

Mr. CAREY. I desire to make the motion at this time in order to get it before the House——

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at present, but the gentleman can state it.

Mr. CAREY. The motion is that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments from section 3 to section 8, both inclusive, and that the House concur in said amendments.

Mr. Speaker, as every gentleman on the floor of this House acquainted with our land system is aware, it had been the custom until twenty years ago on the organization of a Territory to offer a certain amount of lands at public sale. In case such lands were not sold they became subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre, or if within railroad limits at $2.50 per acre. In this wise lands could be purchased by those who did not desire to avail themselves of the settlement laws. No inducement to settlement of this character has been made in Wyoming. No opportunity is afforded to purchase an acre of land of the Government at public or private sale.

By way of preface I desire to repeat what I have already said upon this floor, that I am opposed to the repeal of the land laws unless some laws are substituted that will be applicable to the arid regions of the country. With the homestead law as it is left in this bill and the repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land law there will be no opportunity whatever in the Territories and the States of the arid region for a man to obtain one acre of land and strictly comply with the law. The homestead law as it will exist will be inapplicable to our country. We must have a desert-land law of some kind.

Assertions are made with reference to climatic changes, particularly the increase of rainfall on the great plains of the United States.

It is easy to make statements of this character, but if you investigate the matter you will find there has been no perceptible change in the rainfall during the past twenty years in the arid regions. Civilization has reached the plains. Cattle herds have spread through the valleys and on the mountain sides, large irrigation ditches have been cut, and railroads have been built, but the predicted increase of humidity has not come. So far as the cattle men and the cattle syndicates are concerned it would be to their advantage to have every land law repealed. What the cattle-men need and must have to successfully manage their herds is a free, open, unfenced country. Realizing this, they have removed and destroyed many miles of fences. The fences have proved a failure.

The man who has attempted to carry his herd inside of inclosures without hay and grain to feed in winter has lost in many instances a large part of his herd. If you repeal all the land laws you take away all the means for the settlement and reclamation of the land. It will remain for a long time in the control of these men you call cattle-kings and cattle-herders and cowboys.

It is estimated that the arid regions of the United States that will not produce a crop without irrigation are equal in area to four-tenths of the entire country, exclusive of Alaska. We have arrived I believe at that condition of public sentiment in this country when it may be said that Congress will not make appropriations for the development and reclamation of the country in question. The time for voting large sums of money for internal improvements seems to have passed in this country. While I believe it would be wise for Congress to aid in the construction of irrigation canals, it is not probable that the people would justify the voting of money or lands for such a purpose. The plains and the valleys of the mountains are very fertile and productive when irrigated; without irrigation these lands will not produce a crop. The minimum rain-fall needed to produce a crop is 20 inches. The average rain-fall in the Rocky Mountains is 7 to 14 inches.

If we would therefore have crops produced in that country we must furnish some means or some encouragement for the cutting of these irrigating ditches. As I have heretofore stated, it costs from five to twenty dollars an acre to get the land into a condition to plow. It takes large sums of money to maintain these ditches. I believe in opposing the repeal of the land laws I am working for the best interests of my country. It is true as a Western man I am anxious to see my Territory grow in population and wealth. All men are ambitious for their country, or should be. I want to see the Territory prosperous. To make it so we must have land legislation applicable to our country. If you do not pass the right kind of laws now you will be compelled to do so hereafter, or the lands will remain unoccupied and unproductive.

You ask how much of it can be reclaimed? All of the land that can be irrigated will amount to only a small percentage of the total area of that region. The great body of the plains and mountain sides must remain for years as grazing land. The water is not available for their reclamation. The farmer will live in the valley, and will turn his herds out to graze on the plains and mountain lands, which will be held in common unless the United States chooses to part with its title. You should do something to assist the people in that country in the reclamation of these lands.

Are the provisions of the bill as amended by the Senate liberal? They are very illiberal when you take into consideration the amount of labor that it requires to reclaim any portion of the lands. The bill requires the man who proposes to reclaim the land to go to the land office with a map showing the plan of his canals, flumes, dams, &c., file his declaration, and pay 25 cents an acre for the land, which is certainly four times what it is worth; then, at the end of the first year, he must go and show by good and reputable witnesses that he has expended during the year at least $1 an acre in the construction of the works necessary for the reclamation of the land; he must repeat this at the end of the second and third years, and within four years must make his final proof of actual reclamation and further show that he has cultivated at least eighty acres of the land, and pay the Government an additional sum of $1 an acre. In other words, the Government is to receive its $1.25 an acre, and at the same time it must be shown that the claimant has expended at least an amount equal to $3 an acre in the reclamation of the land. It certainly can not be said that the Government does not receive a fair price for the land. If there is any unfairness it is to the men who propose to reclaim the lands.

There is a great deal of dread expressed here about corporations obtaining possession of these lands. Can the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] tell me of any corporation in the United States today that is engaged in obtaining large bodies of the public land for the purpose of introducing the English tenant system in the United States? Can he tell me of any capitalist who is anxious to invest his money in the lands either of Virginia or Pennsylvania or the West. Investments in lands that are not productive has been found to pay very small interest.

There is a very different condition of things in this country from that which exists in England. The early lawmakers of this country very properly did away with the laws under which estates could be built up and entailed as they have been in Great Britain. It has not been possible in any conceivable way to attain those ends in this country. Lawyers have not been ingenious enough to draw deeds or write wills whereby great landed estates could be preserved in families for any considerable length of time.

The tendency in this country is toward the division of estates and the distribution of the land. We find that the great estates of the South are being rapidly divided; that the great estates which existed in Pennsylvania a century ago are to-day in the hands of small owners, and that the large farms which men undertook to cultivate in Illinois, in Dakota, and in other parts of the West brought bankruptcy upon the owners. The tendency of the country is to small farms and better farming.

Mr. MCADOO. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion? Is it not also a fact that the class of tenant farms in the United States has been largely and rapidly increasing every year?

Mr. CAREY. There is no doubt about that. Tenants are increasing in this country because the farmers are increasing in numbers; but the tendency of the tenant system is not to increase the size of the farms; it is rather to divide them up. Any one can buy land. There are lands for sale in every State and Territory in the Union. No laws prevent the sale. There are more lands for sale than buyers. Lands in the West are only valuable when made so by settlement. They grow in value as the settlers increase in numbers. I rode over different parts of my Territory for twelve years; I went up and down different streams, and at the end of that time very few entries had been made; and the principal land office did not pay but little more than the salary of $500 per year. When immigration began to come in and men began to settle in the valleys, then the lands increased in value—and the more desirable tracts grew in value each year—in proportion to the increase in the population.

The same has been the history throughout the entire West. I have been told that at one time a purchaser went to a land office in the rich prairie country of Illinois and entered 500,000 acres of that land at $1.25 an acre on his own account, and that neither he nor his heirs own an acre of it to-day. It has passed into the hands of small owners. There is no tendency in this country to hold land in large bodies.

Mr. MCADOO. But does not the gentleman think that we have arrived at a period when there is no longer any need of stimulants to the settlement of the land? Does he not think that the pressure of population from the seaboard and the thickly settled East will cause those lands to be settled naturally without any artificial stimulant, and therefore is it not time to call a halt?

Mr. CAREY. I have no doubt that the land will be settled if proper laws are made, but the gentleman must bear in mind that we have more land left than all that has been settled; and what is left is largely arid.

Mr. PAYSON. But not the available land.

Mr. CAREY. I will come to that.

Mr. PERKINS. If it is not available, how can it be settled under the homestead act?

Mr. CAREY. This land is not available under the homestead law, and even if it were, it would be unwise for the Government to hold it against its own citizens when the tide of emigration is moving from the crowded East and going out to the Western country to build up homes.

Mr. FELTON. What do you mean when you speak of "its own citizens?"

Mr. CAREY. I mean that the great bulk of the people who are going West to-day come out of the Eastern and Western States.

Mr. FELTON. Is it not a fact that people come here from other countries, declare their intention, and locate land when they have not been in the country more than six months or a year?

Mr. CAREY. I say that you leave your homestead law in such a condition that I can bring from Italy one thousand or five thousand or any number that may be willing to come, of Italian immigrants, and within five minutes after landing at New York city I can have them qualified to make settlement under the homestead law.

Mr. FELTON. They are now qualified to settle under the pre-emption law?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FELTON. Now, if we should adopt the repealing measure here proposed, even though some other legislation be needed to make our laws what they should be, does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing for the country?

Mr. CAREY. I agree fully with the gentleman that we need new legislation; but, as I understand it, during the last ten years Congress has been discussing this question, and the Public Land Committee have never framed a bill to cover the new condition of things in the West.

Mr. FELTON. Yes, sir, there has been indecent haste to get rid of every acre of the public domain—to give it away, no matter to whom or for what purpose.

Mr. CAREY. In reply to that suggestion I will say that I believe the land policy of this Government, under which it has disposed of its public lands, is the wisest policy the Government could have adopted. I believe it has contributed more to the glory and the strength of this Government than any other measure. The result of that policy has been the same in all the States. Take Illinois, settled under that system in the time of this country's greatest need; she sent forth from her prairie farms more than one hundred complete regiments to do battle for the preservation of the American Union.

Now, I wish to ask gentlemen who are so much opposed to our land laws what they are going to do with the great tracts of unsettled land; what disposition they propose to make of the arid regions. Do they believe in allowing people to settle there? Do they believe in letting the people own the land, or should the Government own it? I know some political economists contend that this Government should become a great landlord owning all the houses and lands and leasing them to the people. But it is the very opposite of this policy which has made our people proud of their Government, made them love their country; because it has been possible for every man who had the money to go into the market and buy a piece of land, or if he wanted to go out West, to buy public land at $1.25 an acre, or make settlement under the homestead law. Our theory has been that it is best for every man to control and own his home.

This policy has caused the people of these United States to love their country, to take a deep interest in its welfare, because they are a part and parcel of it. Much of the land in England, Scotland, and Ireland, I believe, is inalienable; it is tied up under the policy of the English law. Under that policy men who are not fit to own land, men of weak minds (though they probably have what is called royal blood in their veins), are able to control vast bodies of land, while in this country if a man buys or inherits a piece of land he can not keep it unless he has sense enough to take care of it himself. This is the true and the right policy. Under this policy we have grown to the condition in which we are to-day. Under this policy we give every man a chance. If he has the will and ability he can accomplish something. If he has not he goes to the bottom, while the man with will and ambition goes to the top.

There is no ground for the statement that the lands are being accumulated in few hands for the establishment of a foreign land system. The opposite is the fact. With the exception of a few families in the United States, we see no tendency whatever to tie up large estates in one family for any great length of time. Happily the few large estates have not been invested in land, but principally in speculative stocks and bonds.

The desert-land law as amended by this bill is a fair and profitable one to the Government. It is liberal to the Government if not to the Western people. It will bring about the development of the country, and if you keep such a law upon your statute-books it will accomplish much good.

With reference to what has been said about land frauds, I will only say at this time that I have no doubt there has been an amount of money expended in the reclamation of lands in Wyoming equal to $10 an acre for every acre patented under the desert-land law in that Territory. About all this money has gone into the pockets of labor. It takes labor with the pick, shovel, plow, and scraper to cut the irrigation ditches. It is not like building a railroad, where much of the cost and expense is in the wood, iron, and steel consumed. It takes muscle, and nearly the entire cost of reclamation goes directly into the pockets of those who perform the labor.

It will take thousands and millions of dollars in the States and Territories of the arid regions to accomplish very much; and when the work has gone on for fifty years under the desert-land law, there will still be millions and millions of acres in that country waiting for means to be devised and for capital to turn them from their desert character to that condition which will make the growing of crops thereon possible.

There can be no objection to the Government parting with its title to these lands if the title passes to its own citizens. The citizens of the Republic who acquire title to the land make the Republic richer by the acquisition of that title. They make the country wealthier by the crops which are produced from the land they acquire.

If the time shall ever come in this country as predicted when millions of hungry people shall be crying for land and we have no land to give them, let me tell the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] there will rise up in this Hall men wise enough and broad enough in statesmanship to find a remedy. Not unlike the Roman statesman, they can drop from the folds of their togas samples of the well-ripened cereals that grow to the north of our borders and the delicious fruits that mature south of us, and thereby incite the surplus millions to go both to the north and the south and occupy, possess, and cultivate the lands. [Applause.]

Mr. COBB. If gentlemen on the other side are done I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] for ten minutes.

Mr. CAREY. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COBB. I prefer to have gentlemen on the other side get through, if it will suit them just as well.

Mr. CAREY. If that be so I will yield, then, ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas, if he desires to go on at this time.

Mr. PERKINS. I had thought I would make some suggestions concerning the eighth section when it was reached in its logical order. Hence in my opening remarks I did not devote any attention to that section of the bill. As the debate has assumed a general character, perhaps at this time I can with propriety examine briefly that eighth section.

I desire to say to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], if I understood him correctly, I might with propriety make the same charge he makes in the remarks addressed by him to the House—that is if I understood him correctly, that no honest man would advocate these Senate amendments—I might with the same propriety say to him that no honest man would oppose these Senate amendments. My statement would be just as true as his. If his statement proves anything I would take exception to it, but his statement is not true. And if I impugned the motive of every man on this floor who opposes these Senate amendments my statement would not be true.

If I impugned the honesty and motives of every man on this floor as the gentleman from New Jersey impugns the honesty and motives of every man who favors the amendments of the Senate, if I impugned the motives of every man who opposes them, my statement would be as erroneous and false as his. I concede, sir, that men do differ and differ honestly concerning these matters. I am willing to acknowledge that he is honest in his position and in the statement he has made because he knows no better. [Laughter.] I question whether he ever was upon a prairie in his life. I doubt whether he ever met in their homes the people of the West whom he defames.

Mr. MCADOO. Yes; I have.

Mr. PERKINS. Then you should have learned better than to impugn their motives in the way which you have done.

Mr. MCADOO. I understand them and their sentiments in reference to the public-land question as well as the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman knows but little of their wishes or sentiments, judging from the suggestions which he made impugning their motives and integrity.

Mr. MCADOO. I did not say so.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood you to say that no honest man would favor these Senate amendments.

Mr. MCADOO. That was a misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman altogether. I think the gentleman is mistaken about the whole question.

Mr. PERKINS. Gentlemen around me state with unanimity they understood you to say that no man of honesty would advocate the Senate amendments.

Mr. STRUBLE. I think the gentleman said that he hoped no honest man would be found going for the Senate bill, or something to that effect.

Mr. MCADOO. I have no recollection of my exact words, but I believe I said that so far as I understood this question the honest sentiments of impartial men would be found to be in favor of the House bill.

The gentleman wants to hurry up the settlement of the country.

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all; but, on the contrary, I am asking for legislation that will protect the settlers in their rights. I am not asking for legislation here or elsewhere that will unnecessarily or recklessly dispose of the public domain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not in the interest of representatives of the Western communities and Commonwealths to favor the fraudulent occupation of the public lands. We want legislation that will give that territory to honest occupation and settlement. We want legislation that will protect the settler in the honest cultivation of the soil and the quiet possession of his home.

We want legislation that after the settler has occupied the land will confer title upon him and protect him in his rights; not legislation to reserve these lands to great cattle syndicates or companies, or that will reserve as a waste that great unoccupied domain to be traveled over possibly by no one claiming title thereto.

For that reason we oppose this proposed legislation. I have no hesitation in saying that I am opposed to the repeal of the pre-emption law, and I am opposed to its repeal because I believe it would be unwise legislation to do so. It is not the pre-emption law which is at fault. Under the pre-emption law mainly have our Western communities been built up, and through the agency of that law their growth and progress have been simply wonderful.

It is not one settler out of twenty-five who goes West for the purpose of acquiring a home who desires to avail himself of the homestead system. There is not one out of twenty-five who does not desire to take advantage of the pre-emption law, because by so doing in a few months he is able to secure a title to his home, and then of course it becomes subject to taxation. Then it contributes to the growth and development of the community. Then the settlers can build school-houses; then they can build roads, and irrigating ditches, secure railroads, construct bridges, and contribute to the growth and development of the country. Without this pre-emption law this country of which I speak is greatly paralyzed.

As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, much of that territory is not available under existing conditions. But if it is not available now what will be its condition if all of these statutes are stricken down—the timber-culture act, the desert-land act, and the pre-emption law—and the homestead law is alone allowed to remain? That law exists now, and yet the gentleman confesses that much of the land is not available under the present law and existing conditions. If the desert-land act be repealed and these other laws be all stricken down and all but the homestead law abrogated, how will that make all of your territory available?

Mr. CAREY. I yield ten minutes' additional time to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PERKINS. And hence, Mr. Speaker, we who know the existing conditions and necessities of these great Commonwealths oppose this proposed legislation. We believe we understand what is required and know the needs of the people better than those who never saw a prairie or took part in the settlement of new communities.

The gentleman from New Jersey says that no demand has come up in opposition to this legislation. Why, every breeze that comes from the West is freighted with remonstrances and protests in opposition to this proposed legislation; and I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in this connection a letter received a few days ago, not from a fraudulent occupant of the public lands but from an honest bona fide settler of my own State, who but speaks the feeling and sentiment existing in all of these communities.

SHOCKEYVILLE, HAMILTON COUNTY, KANSAS, June 11, 1886.

DEAR SIR: By request of very many settlers on public lands in Southwestern Kansas I write you concerning the probable repeal of the pre-emption and timber-culture laws. I have traveled considerably through Southwestern Kansas this season and have talked with very many of the best citizens upon the prospect of a repeal of the present land laws, and the universal opinion is that it would be the worst thing that could be done the country. Men have come and are still coming here to get pre-emptions and tree claims who do not want to make homestead entries, and their reasons are good ones. Nine-tenths of the settlers want the land all deeded as soon possible, so the lands can be taxed, so we can raise money to build school-houses and make other public improvements.

People are bound to have bridges across the Arkansas River, which they cannot get until the land becomes taxable. We want this country developed as soon as energetic men can develop it, and any legislation that would retard the deeding of the land would work great injury to the settlers. We are having a hard time trying to improve the country, and we look to our delegation in Congress for protection, and we do pray Congress not to throw any obstacle in the way of the development of this Western country. Do not repeal any of the land laws. Let the land be deeded as soon as possible and become taxable, then we can have school-houses, bridges, railroads, irrigating ditches, and other public improvements, and this country will soon blossom like the rose, and we will be a prosperous people. A repeal of the present land laws would be the most injurious legislation Congress could enact to the settlers on this high, dry prairie. We say let us alone and we will be happy.

Yours, truly,

J. G. PENIX.

Hon. B. W. PERKINS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. PERKINS. That letter expresses the views and voices the sentiments of nine-tenths of the settlers upon the public lands. I know the facts to be as stated. If there are fraudulent settlers upon these public lands we are not asking for their protection. If the cattle companies have been organized and have taken violent possession of the public domain remove them, evict them. You have the power to drive them off. Let that power be exercised. If great corporations have gathered and possess that which does not belong under the law to them, take it from them; dispossess them; leave the lands for the benefit of the honest settlers. No opposition to such legislation comes from the Western prairies. But we ask that these men who have gone to make homes under the existing law shall be protected in their rights and granted the privileges existing under the public statutes.

Instead of 90 per cent. of the settlements being fraudulent, as has been stated more than once in the discussion of this question, not 10 per cent. are fraudulent. Fraudulent occupants of the public lands do not convert them into thriving communities or great commonwealths. If these occupations had been fraudulent we would not have seen the wonderfully rapid development of the States and Territories west of the Mississippi River. It is because they have gone there in good faith and are devoting their best efforts to the reclamation of the prairies, building up homes, establishing thriving communities, that we have been enabled to witness that wonderful development, and such men are entitled to the fostering care and protection of this great Government rather than abuse and defamation.

The present Commissioner of the General Land Office says that to investigate eighteen thousand alleged fraudulent entries that he has suspended with his present force will take five years. If it will consume five years to investigate eighteen thousand suspended entries, how much time will be necessarily consumed to investigate the one hundred odd thousand that were made last year, to say nothing of all of the great number suspended by him when he came into office on the 27th of March of last year?

It is in opposition to this that we are contending. We say there should be legislation that will give security to these people, that will protect them in their homes, that will quiet their titles, instead of legislation which will precipitate upon them a contest that will be waged and prosecuted for years, and which will render uncertain during all that period the tenure of their possessions and bring bankruptcy and ruin to these pioneers of our Western prairies.

As is suggested by the writer of the letter which was read a few moments ago, they want a title to their lands so that they may be taxed, that they may build houses, that they may educate their little ones, and so that they may secure the conveniences and comforts of the old and civilized communities of our country. Take from them this legislation and for five years there is no title to the land they occupy. For five years it can not be taxed; for five years you paralyze the community and take from the people all opportunity of revenue and credit except the little that may be obtained from their personal property, and with that it is apparent, or should be, to all that these advantages can not be obtained. Hence we hear those protests in opposition to this proposed legislation.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] says that petitions have come here by thousands asking for this legislation. And yet the gentleman from Illinois well knows that in those petitions, coupled with this, are several other propositions; and I have no hesitancy in saying, as a matter of fact, that those petitions that have come from my own country—and what is true of my own country I presume is true of others—that those petitions are very largely signed because of the other propositions, and not because of any desire to have the pre-emption and desert-land laws repealed. It is because some of them want this $200,000,000 that is spoken of put in circulation; it is because they want aliens prevented from obtaining titles to public lands; it is because they want the Oklahoma country opened to settlement; it is because they want the unearned land grants to railroads forfeited. It is because of these reasons that these petitions come here signed by thousands, rather than because they want the desert-land law or the pre-emption law or the timber-culture law repealed.

I can understand how gentlemen living on the Atlantic coast, not familiar with the conditions existing in the West, not familiar with the practical working of these statutes, can favor the repeal of all laws pertaining to the public land except the homestead law; but we who are familiar with the experiences of the frontiersmen and who know the necessities existing there are, in my judgment, better prepared to speak on this subject, and I know we speak with as much sincerity and with as much integrity as those who hail from other sections; and I say this legislation pertaining to the desert-land act and the pre-emption law should not be stricken down by this Congress or any other.

If frauds are practiced, let us amend the law, as suggested by the gentleman from California or legislate anew; let the Committee on Public Lands report a bill which is calculated to protect the public domain against fraudulent occupation, and every man who hails from the West will favor it, and no man will support it more earnestly than I; no man will advocate it more earnestly than my colleagues and these gentlemen who represent Western constituencies. But do not take from us the opportunity of reclaiming those mountains, those prairies, those deserts, because, as has been confessed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], the lands in those regions are not available and never can be available under the homestead law.

Mr. Speaker, as we vote upon these different propositions I hope that this House will recognize the fact that these Senate amendments are meritorious and wise, and instead of longer insisting upon our disagreement thereto let us concur therein. If the pre-emption law is to be repealed, if the timber-culture act is to be stricken down, let us repeal them with provisions that will protect the honest occupants of those lands and shelter them from long, weary, and exhaustive contests or litigation.

Mr. COBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There are two theories touching our public-land policy, or rather two distinct theories struggling for supremacy. One is presented by this bill as it passed the House and the other by the Senate amendments to the bill.

The House bill proceeds on the theory that all the remaining public domain should be held for settlement under the homestead laws in parcels not greater than 160 acres. Following and in harmony with that theory is the other bill, passed by the House, which appropriates money to enable the Land Department to discover and unearth the frauds that have been heretofore perpetrated in relation to the public domain. And following along third in order is the bill now on the Calendar, reported favorably to the House, making appropriations for digging irrigating ditches in what are known as the arid regions of the public domain.

Now these three measures are in harmony, and constitute a well-defined theory upon which the House proposes to proceed. First, preserve the public domain to actual settlers; next, unearth the frauds that have been perpetrated and appropriate money for that purpose; third, when you reach the arid region appropriate money for irrigating ditches, so that when our population becomes crowded and there is no longer arable land within the rain belt you may enable the settler to go upon the arid region and raise crops by means of irrigation. This is the true and wise theory.

Now what is the theory represented by the Senate amendment? It is this: Validate the frauds that have been perpetrated upon the public domain; allow what is known as the arid region to be taken up by cattle speculators and syndicates, and strike down the appropriation for the investigation of frauds, so that the Land Office will be powerless to protect the inheritance of the people. Can this House hesitate which theory to adopt? Here are the two theories, one represented by the Senate, the other by the House. There should not be a dissenting voice. This House will never abandon its position or agree to the policy of the Senate—never.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] says there is no danger; the tendency in the United States is toward the division of land into small holdings. I do not know where the gentleman gets his information. The census report of 1880 shows that the tendency is just the reverse, and every man's observation must teach him that the tendency is toward large holdings and tenant farming. The tendency of our population is away from the country and toward the city. The census also shows another fact, namely, that the number of tenant farmers in this country has increased enormously of late years. The tenant farmers now outnumber the freeholders of the country. It is so in my own State and every other; the tendency is to large holdings; whereas in a healthy condition of our land laws and of the Republic the tendency ought to lead from the city to the country, and the result should be small farms and high cultivation. The House bill will not interfere with the title of any bona fide entryman, nor with the title of any purchaser from a bona fide entryman.

Another departure in the Senate amendment is this: For a hundred years it has been the policy of this country to settle the validity of land entries before the proper officers within the land district with the right of review by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, and finally, if necessary, by the courts. These Senate amendments propose to take this matter out of the hands of the land officers and make it the duty of the Attorney-General to proceed by suit in a Federal court to settle the good faith of all those alleged fraudulent entries. If this provision were adopted I venture to say that the Federal courts during the next century would not be able to investigate properly the frauds that have been committed upon the public domain.

Let us stand, then, by the House theory. Let us repeal all these land laws except the homestead law. Let us appropriate money to expose these frauds. Then let us pass a law for the construction of irrigating ditches in the arid regions and preserve those lands for the future for the homeless and the poor. The House says, away with speculation. The Senate says, give the speculator a chance, validate his frauds, and sanction his crimes. The House says, appropriate money to unearth the gigantic frauds upon the public domain, and hold up the hands of our faithful Commissioner in the grand work he is doing for the people. The Senate replies by striking down the House appropriation so that the Commissioner can not proceed. The House says, hold the arid lands for the future and make provision for their reclamation. The Senate says, turn them over into the hands of speculators and cattle syndicates. Here is the issue well defined, so that he who runs may read.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, as it is now quite late I shall not long occupy the attention of the House. I do not care to discuss now the legal propositions involved in this bill, as they have been so fully discussed on both sides. It has been stated, however, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has not been looking into the question of frauds in the South. I want to let gentlemen understand that they may be mistaken in this regard. I send to the desk to be read a letter from the chief of division who has charge of that subject to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 17, 1886.

SIR: During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, legal proceedings were instituted on recommendation of this department against parties in the Southern States for timber depredations upon the public lands, as follows:

Mississippi	26	17	108,183 00
Total	183	103	462,219 42

While in the same States during the previous fiscal year only twenty-two criminal suits and twenty civil suits were instituted, involving $148,713.92. (See Land Office report, 1885.)

Very respectfully,

ARCHIBALD YOUNG,
Acting Chief Special Service Division.

Hon. W. A. SPARKS,
Commissioner of the General Land Office.

ARCHIBALD YOUNG,
Acting Chief Division P.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, the letter just read shows that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is vigorously exercising his official power to protect the public lands everywhere—as well in the South as elsewhere in the country. I think it the duty of all good men to sustain him in this effort. As to the charge that he is exceeding his legitimate powers and duties, I submit the charge can not be sustained. I shall say no more in defense of the Commissioner.

But it is said that these land frauds do not exist to the extent which the Commissioner would have us believe. Indeed, from the arguments of some gentlemen here we might suppose that no frauds at all exist in their localities. I wish to say to such gentlemen that the records of the General Land Office are crowded with the evidence of parties living in the localities from which they come, showing the frauds in the entries of the public lands to be numerous. I send to the desk an official letter; and I ask gentlemen to listen to it and determine whether the facts therein stated are consistent with the views which they have expressed on this floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 19, 1886.

SIR: During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, there were canceled or held for cancellation for fraud two hundred and eighty-five entries in Nebraska and one hundred and fourteen in Kansas, embracing about 63,000 acres of land. There are still a large number of cases not yet acted on for the want of sufficient force. A large majority of these entries were made in the interest of cattle companies or by individuals for cattle and sheep ranches.

Fifty-five entries of land lying within the Brighton and Finlin ranches in the North Platte district, Nebraska, have been canceled or held for cancellation upon report of agents or testimony taken at hearings, showing that all of the entries were made by members of the companies or by their employés for the companies, and that the claimants neither improved nor resided upon their claims.

A number of other entries of land within said companies' ranches are awaiting action and are of the same character as those examined.

In the McCook and North Platte districts, Nebraska, one hundred and sixty-six entries were made by procurement of one Arnold in the interest of cattlemen. These entries have all been canceled or held for cancellation, and Arnold is now a fugitive from justice.

Alleged claimants have relinquished during the last year about nineteen hundred entries in the Wa Keeney office, Kansas; six hundred in the Larned office, Kansas; sixteen hundred in the McCook office, Nebraska, and eighteen hundred in the Valentine office, Nebraska, embracing in all about nine hundred thousand acres of land.

It is estimated that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, at least six thousand entries were relinquished in Nebraska.

The greater portion, if not all, of these entries were made solely for speculation and with no intention of complying with the law, and the relinquishments were undoubtedly caused by the investigations that were being made by special agents.

Very respectfully,

B. B. SIMMES,
Chief of Special Service Division.

Hon. WILLIAM A. J. SPARKS,
Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. COBB. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, these facts from the records of the Land Office show a state of things requiring an amendment of the law so as to preserve, if possible, our public lands from spoliation. We have now before us a bill, which in its original form was passed in this House by a vote of nearly 5 to 1. The Senate has stricken out all after the enacting clause and inserted a new bill, the provisions of which have been to-day fully discussed. Without going further into that discussion, I will say that if this Senate amendment should be adopted all the frauds mentioned in the letter just read would be confirmed, and the titles of the lands in question would be perfected. I submit, therefore, it is important that the amendment of the Senate should be defeated. I trust that this House, in its wisdom, in its desire to protect the public lands in the future from spoliation, will concur with the recommendation of the House conferees and insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate. Let us have a further conference, and see whether we can not convince those gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol that the provisions of the bill as passed by the House should be sustained.

It has been intimated here that those of us who do not live in the extreme West do not know much about this question. I suppose that there are gentlemen here from other portions of the country who have familiarized themselves with the frauds which have been committed and which are being committed every day. To say that a gentleman who has served upon the Public Lands Committee for four or six years does not know anything about the public lands would be attributing to him great weakness of intellect or want of industry in the discharge of his duty as a member of Congress and a member of that committee. Gentlemen who live in those localities where these frauds exist know no more about this question than we do who have studied the matter carefully from the records, which are full and complete upon all these questions, as they well know. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] that the House recede from its disagreement to the first section of the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. PAYSON. I make a point of order against that motion for the reason that the Senate amendment is a proposition to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a single measure as a substitute. That proposition, I submit, is not divisible.

Mr. PERKINS. There are, as the Chair will observe, several sections in the Senate bill. My motion relates merely to the first section. The House voted in the first instance to non-concur in the Senate amendment. I now move that the House recede from its non-concurrence as to the first section of that amendment, and agree to the first section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the amendment of the Senate having been adopted by that body in the form of several sections, the motion of the gentleman from Kansas is in order.

Mr. PAYSON. Before the Chair finally decides, let me make another suggestion. Upon the return of the bill to this House from the Senate the proposition was made to non-concur in the Senate amendment, which motion was carried, and a committee of conference appointed. The conferees have met, and they report that they are unable to agree. Now, the Senate amendment is a single amendment. It can not, I submit, be taken up by sections to determine whether we will insist or recede as to each section. It seems to me there is no question about this. If there is the least doubt in the mind of the Chair, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the proposition now pending is not to be treated as if it were a bill originally before the House for consideration. The Senate has adopted an amendment in the form of a substitute; and the House having non-concurred in that amendment, the conferees appointed have failed to agree. There is no independent propesition reported by the conferees, favorably or unfavorably. We report, as the Chair will see from the written statement accompanying our report, that the conferees have been unable to agree upon any item—upon anything connected with this Senate amendment.

It stands as an amendment in the House bill striking out everything after the enacting clause and inserting the entire bill proposed by the Senate as a substitute for the House bill. It strikes me it goes without saying you can not take up one proposition after another. It is presented as an entirety; we agree or we do not agree. I do not know argument can make it plainer.

Mr. RYAN. Is it competent for a conference to agree to a part of the Senate amendments?

Mr. PAYSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. RYAN. And disagree to another?

Mr. REED, of Maine. The House is not controlled by the conference.

Mr. SPRINGER. It occurs to me this is but one amendment. To recede from the House disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same is one proposition. But we can recede from our disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same with an amendment thereto to leave out any of the sections. There are but two propositions now before us: First, to insist on our disagreement, which is the proposition of the conference committee. The second, to recede from our disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same with an amendment. These three are the only propositions in order in parliamentary course of procedure.

These are the propositions: First, the motion proposed by the committee to insist on our disagreement; second, the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas to recede from our disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same with an amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. The proposition of the gentleman from Kansas is not the proposition stated by my colleague. [Cries of "Vote!"] It is that we recede from our disagreement as to one section.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the point I am making. You can only recede from the disagreement of the House. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. PERKINS. For the purpose of saving time I am willing so to amend as to recede from our disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the only way in which it can be reached. The other motion is not divisible.

The question recurred on Mr. PERKINS'S motion to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 142.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. COBB'S motion to insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment was adopted; and the House asked for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House, Mr. COBB, Mr. STONE of Missouri, and Mr. PAYSON.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at 3 o'clock p. m., July 28, 1886.

[Great applause.]

MRS. R. E. WARD.

Mr. HATCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9875) granting a pension to Mrs. R. E. Ward; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT PHILIPS.

Mr. HATCH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9876) for the relief of Robert Philips; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HATCH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 203) providing for the printing of the third annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

BARRACKS, NEWPORT, KY.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 6066) to authorize the Secretary of War to improve and enlarge the barracks at Newport, Ky.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL AHR AND OTHERS.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also, by unanimous consent, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6167) to remove the charge of desertion against Michael Ahr, Jacob A. Sisson, and John Hill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BRAGG, by unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 882) to regulate the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy; and the same was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

JOHN POTTS.

Mr. HITT. I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 118) relative to certain papers in the State Department deposited there by error, and put it upon its passage. This resolution provides for the withdrawal from the State Department of these papers, and was reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the last Congress as well as in this unanimously.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read subject to objection.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to the person justly entitled to the possession thereof the papers in the claim of the late John Potts, a British subject residing in Mexico, presented to the United States and Mexican Claims Commission through the agency of a Mr. MacManus, also a resident of Mexico, said papers containing certain original documents issued by the Mexican Government on the collectors of customs at sundry ports for the payment of moneys to said John Potts, and which moneys he had loaned to the Mexican Government; the said papers having been deposited in the State Department by error.

The report (by Mr. HITT) is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution relative to certain papers in the State Department by error, have considered the same and recommend its passage.

It appears that when the United States and American Claims Commission was appointed to examine the papers that would be presented to them for the purpose of settling the claims of citizens of both countries, Mr. John Potts (a British subject), residing in Mexico, through the agency of a Mr. MacManus, also a resident of Mexico, laid before the commission certain original documents issued by the Mexican Government on the collectors of customs at sundry ports for the payment of money to said John Potts, and which he had loaned to the Mexican Government.

The Claims Commission, on examining the papers in question, rejected them, on the ground that being a claim of a British subject they could on no account be adjusted among the claims to be passed upon by the said commission, and consequently the papers were handed over to the State Department, at Washington, for safe keeping. The Secretary of State states to the agent of the executrix of the said John Potts, Mrs. Florence Graham Hardy, that he is not authorized to deliver up said papers without a special act of Congress to that effect.

The papers are in the State Department by error, and should be returned in accordance with the joint resolution, which follows the precedent of joint resolution No. 17, of June 28, 1879 (p. 54, vol. 21, Stat. L). All safeguards are thrown around the joint resolution by providing that the papers shall only be returned to the person justly entitled to the possession thereof. As an act of justice the papers should be returned at once.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COST OF PRINTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask consent to submit a resolution for present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be directed to inform the House as to the cost of printing the private bills (including what is known as the "Calendar print") of the House of Representatives during the present session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having bills or resolutions to present may send them up to the Clerk's desk for reference by the Speaker under the rule.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will indorse their names upon the bills, and the Journal and RECORD will show the introduction and reference as soon as they can be prepared.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) resumed its session.

MODIFICATION OF POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5878) to amend an act entitled "An act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883; and yield to my colleague on the committee, Mr. JONES, of Texas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the first section of the act entitled "An act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," be amended so as to read as follows:

"That for the transmission of small sums under $5 through the mails the Postmaster-General may authorize postmasters at money-order offices, or at such other offices as he may designate, to issue money-orders, without corresponding advices, on an engraved form to be prescribed and furnished by him; and a money-order issued on such new form shall be designated and known as a "postal note," and a fee of 3 cents shall be charged for the issue thereof. Every postmaster who shall issue a postal note under the authority of the Postmaster-General shall make the same payable to bearer, when duly receipted, at any money-order office; and after a postal note has once been paid, to whomsoever it has been paid, the United States shall not be liable for any further claim for the amount thereof; but a postal note shall become invalid and not payable upon the expiration of three calendar months from the last day of the month during which the same was issued; and the holder, to obtain the amonnt of an invalid postal note must forward it to the Superintendent of the Money-Order System, at Washington, D. C., together with an application, in such manner and form as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, for a duplicate thereof, payable to such holder; and an additional fee of 3 cents shall be charged and exacted for the issue of the duplicate: Provided, That all provisions of law applicable to the issue of postal-notes at money-order offices, and to postmasters' clerks and other employés therein, shall be equally applicable to officers authorized to issue postal notes under this act."

SEC. 2. That section 5463 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 5463. Any person who shall, with intent to defraud, falsely make, forge, counterfeit, engrave, or print, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, counterfeited, engraved, or printed, or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, counterfeiting, engraving, or printing, any order in imitation of, or purporting to be, a money-order or postal note issued by or under the direction of the Post-Office Department of the United States, or of any foreign country, and payable in the United States, or any material signature or indorsement thereon; any person who shall falsely alter, or cause or procure to be falsely altered, or willingly aid or assist in falsely altering any such money-order or postal note; any person who shall, with intent to defraud, pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish, as true, any such false, forged, counterfeited, or altered money-order or postal note, knowing the same, or any signature or indorsement thereon, to be false, forged, counterfeited, or altered, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than two years and not more than five years."

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. JONES, of Texas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4677) to authorize the payment of postal notes at any money-order office, and for other purposes, beg leave to submit the accompanying substitute therefor and recommend its passage.

Section 1 of this bill amends section 1 of the act of March 3, 1883, which authorized the issue of postal notes, by adding a provision that postal notes shall be payable at any money-order office authorized by the Postmaster-General to pay such note, and an additional provision empowering the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, to designate post-offices for the issue of postal notes only, independently of money orders. These provisions will widely extend the usefulness of the postal note, and in the opinion of the Post-Office Department, after an experience of nearly two years and a half, will render them more convenient and give greater satisfaction to the public.

The first provision will obviate all the difficulty now encountered through the mistaken payment at one money-order office of a postal note drawn upon another (payments which now occur in considerable numbers), and would furthermore save the clerical labor now required in post-offices of designating the office of payment on the face of the note, of recording the name thereof on the corresponding stub, and of reporting the same to the Post-Office Department in the postmaster's weekly statement of money-order business. It would likewise facilitate the payment of postal notes, inasmuch as it would no longer be necessary for the paying officer to examine carefully each note presented to see that it is properly drawn upon the money-order office of which payment is demanded. This provision was recommended by the Superintendent of the Money-Order System in his last annual report, and by the Postmaster-General in these words:

"The argument he (the Superintendent) adduces in support of his further recommendation that postal notes should be made issuable to bearer and payable at any money-order office so satisfactorily enforces it that addition is unnecessary. It is to be hoped that the public will not long be forced to wait the grant of this improvement in their service."

The second provision extends to post-offices situated in the smaller towns and villages where, for lack of post-office capital, a general money-order business can not be maintained, a medium of exchange greatly needed, and in many localities urgently demanded. Sparsely settled communities where there are no banks will thus be supplied with a convenient means of remitting small sums to business centers. The responsibility of the postmasters at such offices will be increased simply in the face value of the small number of blank postal notes intrusted to their charge, a responsibility which it is thought can be readily provided for by means of small additional bonds. The Post-Office Department will not need to undertake to supply such smaller offices with funds, because they are simply to be granted the privilege of issuing postal notes, not of paying them, the only privilege which the business necessities of their communities require.

Section 2 of the bill re-enacts the existing statute (section 5463, Revised Statutes), and extends its provisions to postal notes as well as to money-orders issued in a foreign country for payment in the United States.

The necessity for this legislation lies in the fact that there is nothing specific in existing law that subjects a person who forges the signature upon a money-order issued in a foreign country for payment in this country to trial, and if found guilty, to punishment. A case of this nature occurred in the late part of 1883, at Bay City, Mich., where the United States attorney decided that th eforger of a Canadian money-order was not punishable under United States statutes and where it was necessary to make complaint and prosecute the forger under State laws. A similar case (of a British order) occurred later in New York city.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I am directed by the committee to offer the following amendment: In line 13, after the word "thereon," insert "or any material signature upon any receipt or certificate of identification thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. There is also a typographical error which has crept in the bill, and the committee direct me to move its amendment.

It occurs on the second page in line 32, after the word "postmasters." An apostrophe has been inserted improperly. It changes the sense of the sentence by putting it in the possessive case when it should be in the objective. This apostrophe should be stricken out and a comma inserted after the word "postmasters."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire, without making any motion for the present, whether the committee have considered the propriety of permitting these postal notes to extend to $5.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Yes, sir; they extend now to sums below $5.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. To $4.99.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move, if my friend from Texas will consent, to strike out the word "under" where it occurs in the sixth line of the first section of the bill and insert the same word after the word "dollars," in the seventh line; so that it will read:

That for the transmission of small sums, $5 and under, &c.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend will not insist upon that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me, I will state that the reason for making it applicable to sums under $5 is that in issuing the postal orders the numbers representing the dollars and cents are punched out, and it would be difficult without changing the present system to extend that to $5. It allows the transmission of any sums now up to $4.99. Above that amount the money orders come in.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where is the trouble in using the same system in regard to $5 and under?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It would require a new series to begin at $5; and if you do not want to run above $5 you do not want to begin at that sum. It would require an entirely new series.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that is quite an unimportant item, it seems to me, in view of the value of such a service where it extended to sums of even $5 or less.

The value of the postal notes will be greatly increased by extending it to $5.

Mr. PETERS. In order to obtain the 1 cent difference between $5 and $4.99 there would be required a large amount of expense to reprint the postal notes now prepared by the Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not insist on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer an amendment to come in at line 22 of section 2.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I have not yielded the floor, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

On ordering the previous question there were—ayes 67, noes none.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. JONES, of Texas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call up the bill (H. R. 7536) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes, and yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps there would be no objection to considering the bill in the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. I prefer to insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HATCH in the chair), and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7536) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail-matter, as frequently as the public business may require, at every incorporated city, village, or borough containing a population of 50,000 within its corporate limits, and may be so employed at every such place containing a population of not less than 10,000 within its corporate limits, and at any post-office which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000; and cities, villages, and boroughs in convenient proximity, whose aggregate population shall equal 15,000, or whose post-offices together produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of $15,000, may be consolidated in one post-office delivery, and the post-office located where it shall be deemed most serviceable to the public convenience.

SEC. 2. That there may be in all cities which contain a population of 75,000 or more three classes of letter-carriers, as follows: Carriers of the first class, whose salaries shall be $1,000 per annum; of the second class, whose salaries shall be $850 per annum; and of the third class, whose salaries shall be $600 per annum.

SEC. 3. That in places containing a population of less than 75,000 there may be two classes of letter-carriers, as follows: Carriers of the second class, whose salaries shall be $850 per annum, and of the third class, whose salaries shall be $600 per annum. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1886.

SEC. 4. That all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads recommended the following amendment:

In section 1, commencing at line 9, strike out the following:

"And at any post-office which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000; and cities, villages, and boroughs in convenient proximity, whose aggregate population shall equal 15,000, or whose post-offices together produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of $15,000, may be consolidated in one post-office delivery, and the post-office located where it shall be deemed most serviceable to the public convenience."

And insert as follows:

"According to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law, and at which place the post-office produced a gross postal revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less that $10,000: Provided, This act shall not affect the existence of the free delivery in places where it is now established: And provided further, That in offices where the free delivery shall be established under the provisions of this act, such free delivery shall not be abolished by reason of decrease below 10,000 in population and $10,000 in gross postal revenue, except in the discretion of the Postmaster-General."

In section 2, line 5, strike out "$850" and insert "$800."

Mr. DOCKERY. This is a bill to extend the free-delivery system and to classify the carrier service. The free-delivery service was originally established by the act of March 3, 1863, and went into operation July 1, 1863, with sixty-six offices, and cost the first year $317,061.20.

The original act has been amended by the act of February 21, 1879; and the law now authorizing the free-delivery system constitutes section 5 of that act. And that the House may be fully advised as to its terms I will read section 5, which authorizes the present system. It provides that—

Letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail-matter as frequently as the public convenience may require, at every place containing a population of 50,000 within the delivery of its post office, and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than 20,000 within its corporate limits, and at post-offices which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $20,000: Provided, That this act shall not affect the free delivery in towns and cities where it is now established.

That is the present law authorizing the free-delivery system. This bill proposes to amend that law so as to extend the service to cities having a population of 10,000, ascertained according to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law, and at which place the post-office produces a gross postal revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000.

In other words, the committee propose to extend this system to all cities having 10,000 population, the post-offices of which for the preceding fiscal year produced a gross postal revenue of $10,000 or more. This provision of the pending bill will extend the free-delivery system to forty-three cities at a cost—provided that the law had gone into operation at the beginning of the present fiscal year and provided that it shall be established at every one of these forty-three cities—of $115,558.20. But, as is well known to members who have investigated this matter, there are some of these cities that perhaps will not apply for the service. Then again there are others of these forty-three cities that will not have what has been heretofore considered requisite by the Department, such as properly-numbered houses, lighted streets, and paved or planked sidewalks; so that the committee estimate that the appropriations for the first year to carry into effect this provision of the bill will not require to exceed $75,000, and I think a reasonable estimate would be $50,000.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to call his attention to section 2, where the committee has stricken out of the salaries provided for carriers of the second class the words "and fifty," making the salary $800?

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will come to the second and third sections in a moment. I am only addressing myself now to the first section. The Clerk suggests to me that a number of bills improperly printed are in the hands of members. The original bill was incorrectly printed and a reprint of the bill was ordered. The correct bill is here, and if some page will take charge of it members can see precisely what it contains.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question, that the House may thoroughly understand his position, which I fully understand, but by virtue of the misprint in the hands of many gentlemen is not understood. What I want gentlemen to distinctly understand is this proposition. The bill that the committee recommend is that the letter-carrier service shall be established at cities containing a population of 10,000 as well as producing a gross revenue of $10,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states the provisions of the bill correctly, as I endeavored to do a few moments ago.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will permit me to explain the second and third sections of the bill I will then yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is the section to which my question relates.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. How many towns are there in the Union that will be entitled to this increase of service that would not otherwise have it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Forty-three, as I said a little while ago.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will allow me, I will call his attention to this bill. Since he stated that some of the bills have been incorrectly printed I have sent and got another, and I still find stricken out the provision which authorizes the Postmaster-General to extend the free-delivery system to towns or cities having a population of 10,000 and a gross revenue of $10,000.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman will turn his bill over he will find the amendment on the other side.

Mr. DOCKERY. The correct bill will be found at the conclusion of my report. I do not think there is any trouble about the matter. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will examine the bill, he will find the amendment on the second page.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the second and third sections of the bill simply classify the letter-carrier service. They make no changes whatever in the salary account of that service, but simply classify the carriers. As the law stands at present there are first and second class carriers and auxiliary carriers. These sections of the bill provide for first, second, and third class carriers, the third class taking the place of the auxiliary carriers. The Attorney-General has decided that where an auxiliary carrier is appointed there must be a principal, either a first or a second class carrier; so that the effect of this bill, if it has any effect at all (and it does affect the salaries to this extent), will be that for the first year of a free-delivery office the Postmaster-General will be authorized to inaugurate the system with third-class carriers, thus saving the difference between the salaries of first class and third class carriers.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will permit me, under the present law there are letter-carriers who go into the service without pay and are kept there learning the routes and the various duties, sometimes for five or six months acting as substitutes without pay. Do I understand that these third-class carriers are to be substituted for that class of carriers?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his question. This bill makes no change whatever with reference to substitute carriers. It leaves the existing law intact.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow an amendment to be put upon this bill providing that where the post-office takes one of these men and keeps him four or five months learning the business, so that in case of a vacancy there will be a carrier on hand to do the work, he shall have some remuneration while he is discharging those duties and shall not be kept there doing duty and supporting himself?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will read the present law on that subject, to which I have never heard objection made by any one. This is the law:

Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint one or more substitute letter-carriers, whose compensation shall be $1 per annum and the pro rata compensation of the letter-carriers whose routes they may be required to serve.

The gentlemen will see that when one of these "substitutes" performs service as a carrier he gets the pay of the carrier whose substitute he is.

Mr. SCOTT. But that class of substitutes remains on duty sometimes three or four or five months, and perhaps they do get a dollar once in a while, but not often; and after all they are often driven out of the service because they can not remain without compensation.

Mr. DOCKERY. If they are driven out it is because the office has no use for their services. They take these positions in the hope that, by resignation or accident or something of that kind, they may succeed to the places of carriers.

Mr. BINGHAM. They are in the service in the position indicated by their title. They are "substitutes," and if I am a carrier and am absent from my duty a day or a week, the substitute is the only man authorized to do the work, and he gets my pay during the time I am absent and he is on duty.

Mr. SCOTT. I remember that there is an expression to the effect that "hope deferred maketh the heart ache," and I have known these substitutes to stay in the service three or four months, until they had become thoroughly acquainted with the duties of the position, and after all be compelled to give it up in disgust. Then when a vacancy did occur a new and untrained man had to be taken up who was unable to perform the service as it ought to be performed, and that was the result of allowing these trained substitutes no compensation. If a salary of $400 per annum were allowed to these substitutes there would be some inducement for them to remain in the hope of promotion; but when they receive no pay at all it is not to be wondered at that, growing weary of waiting, they leave.

Mr. DOCKERY. The salaries of substitute letter-carriers, like those of all officers under the Government of the United States, ought to be based on the service rendered; and if these substitute carriers render no service to the Government they ought not to receive any compensation.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman answer me one question? In section 2 the pay of second-class carriers is fixed at $800, and in section 3 the pay of second-class carriers is fixed at $850. I desire to know whether this is purposely done.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is purposely done, and it is the present law.

Mr. FELTON. I wish to know whether it is intended to have in this service a sort of training-school; whether a set of substitutes are to be kept under pay with a view to the contingency of their services being required.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the purpose of the law. The gentleman will remember that under the existing law the letter-carriers receive thirty days leave of absence, during which time these substitutes come in and perform the work, and whenever a vacancy occurs one of the substitutes is appointed to such vacancy.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may close, and that we may now proceed to consider the bill by sections.

Mr. CRAIN. That does not cut off amendments?

Mr. DOCKERY. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be now closed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by sections for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter, as frequently as the public business may require, at every incorporated city, village, or borough containing a population of 50,000 within its corporate limits, and may be so employed at every such place containing a population of not less than 10,000 within its corporate limits, and at any post-office which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000; and cities, villages, and boroughs in convenient proximity, whose aggregate population shall equal 15,000, or whose post-offices together produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of $15,000, may be consolidated in one post-office delivery, and the post-office located where it shall be deemed most serviceable to the public convenience.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was read, as follows:

Strike out from the words "and at any post-office," in line 9, down to the end of the section, and insert the following:

"According to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law, and at which place the post-office produced a gross postal revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000: Provided, This act shall not affect the existence of the free delivery in places where it is now established: And provided further, That in offices where the free delivery shall be established under the provisions of this act, such free delivery shall not be abolished by reason of decrease below 10,000 in population and $10,000 in gross postal revenue, except in the discretion of the Postmaster-General."

Mr. PLUMB. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out line 17 and all of line 18 down to the word "law," and after line 8 insert the following:

"And within the limits of adjacent blocks which not being within such corporate limits and are immediately adjacent thereto, and are occupied by those who receive their mail matter at the post-office within said corporate limits."

Mr. DOCKERY. I reserve a point of order on that amendment to hear a statement from the gentleman.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to extend the provisions of this bill not only to those cities having within their corporate limits 10,000 inhabitants, but to cities which, failing to meet this requirement, would be brought within the benefits of the system by including as part of their population adjacent and thickly settled territory, the inhabitants of which receive all their mail matter at the post-office of the adjoining city. I know of many cities of this character where for various reasons the adjacent population is not included within the corporate limits, but is to all intents and purposes a part of the population of the city, and just as much entitled to the benefits of the letter-carrier system as though within the corporate limits. It is to meet the requirements of such communities that my amendment is offered.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I trust that this bill, which has been carefully prepared under the supervision of the Post-Office Department, will be passed as nearly as possible in the form in which it has been reported. The bill provides that the population necessary to entitle any city to the benefits of the free-delivery system shall be ascertained by the Federal census or a State census. When you adopt any other standard you must resort to the estimates of persons residing in the locality, sometimes the postmasters, always persons interested in making as large a showing of population as possible. The only way to avoid an exaggerated statement of population is to adopt the method indicated by the bill. I trust that the amendment just offered will not be agreed to.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether there is any definite information as to what this bill will cost.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The report shows that.

Mr. BLOUNT. The experience of the Department furnishes a pretty good guide in making an estimate.

A MEMBER. What is the estimate?

Mr. BURROWS. The estimated expense to be incurred under this bill is $115,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, and debate has been exhausted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have a further amendment. I move to strike out the word "and," in the eighteenth line, and insert the word "or." I think if that is done the object of the gentleman from Illinois will be accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to suggest that there are two amendments pending at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. BLOUNT. Consequently a third amendment would not be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending already.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer it in the way of a substitute, or rather I make a motion to amend the text which is proposed to be stricken out, and suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the words "according to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law" had better be allowed to stand, and insert after the word "law" "or a census duly taken under authority of such city, village, or borough."

Mr. PLUMB. I accept the suggestion and will so modify the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest, therefore, that the gentleman withdraw his motion to strike out the seventeenth and eighteenth lines and substitute what I have suggested after the word "law."

Mr. PLUMB. Very well. I accept that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suggest that this is not a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. But the amendment, as the Chair understands, has been withdrawn and presented in form as now modified.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the amendment had been debated and it can not be withdrawn without consent.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection, as the Chair understood, to the modification.

Mr. HEPBURN. I now offer the amendment which I have suggested as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or;" so that it will read:

"According to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law, or at which place the post-office produced a gross postal revenue," &c.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to be heard on the amendment and the substitute.

I sincerely hope this House will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. This system and every other system that involves an expenditure of the people's money ought to rest upon a solid and stable foundation, and we all know how unreliable these census returns are which are taken simply by the authorities of a city or village.

I know, sir, of a city within the State of Missouri where a census was taken for a purpose that exhibited a population of 4,500 people, while by the Federal census the city had a population of only 3,000, and there was no growing business or population which would indicate that there had been an increase of 1,500 people in five years.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment or substitute of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will not prevail, for the reason that it involves an expenditure from the public Treasury that this House can not now afford to make. I am, sir, an earnest advocate of this free-delivery system. It was organized on the 1st day of July, 1863, and up to the 1st of July of the present year, twenty-three years, only one hundred and eighty cities of the United States had been brought within its provisions. This bill proposes to extend that system to forty-three additional cities in one year, which, in my opinion, is progress sufficient for this Congress to make. If the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa be adopted it extends the system to one hundred and ten other cities at an expenditure to the people of $330,000.

Now, while I most heartily favor the system I am not at this session willing to go to that limit in its behalf. Let us pass this bill. Let us go to the limit of forty-three cities, and in the next year if thought best we can extend it still further and take in the remainder of the one hundred and ten cities covered by the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know—the Chair has now in possession the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa—if in the opinion of the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not completed my inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee submitted an amendment to the first section, to which the gentleman from Illinois on the left offered a further amendment, and afterward modified it on the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana on the right. The gentleman from Iowa offered an amendment as a substitute.

Mr. BLOUNT. Which is no substitute at all. I desire to make my parliamentary inquiry, which I had not finished. On examination of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa it does not relate to the amendment pending, and it could not be, as a matter of course, a substitute.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is evident the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has not examined the amendment, or he would not make that statement. It does refer to the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. It relates to another subject, and I hold it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order against it?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do make it; I have already made it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLOUNT. That it is not in order as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. McCOMAS. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. I am in favor of the bill and shall vote for it in any shape; but, if I understand, under the present system the alternative is so much population or so much receipts?

Mr. DOCKERY. The present law is 20,000 population or twenty thousand revenue. This bill provides for 10,000 population and ten thousand revenue.

Mr. McCOMAS. Now, then, when we come down in population why should we not have an alternative of receipts?

Mr. DOCKERY. For the reason that that involves an expenditure of $445,000.

Mr. FELTON. That is in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, is it not?

Mr. DOCKERY. The establishment of offices everywhere in cities with a population below 50,000 is within his discretion. What is now proposed involves an expenditure that I feel we are not warranted in making. I am willing to give the free-delivery system to cities having a population of 10,000 which produce $10,000 revenue.

Mr. CANNON addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word of the substitute.

A MEMBER. There is only one word in it.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move to strike out the last letter of the substitute.

I want to talk a minute about the effect of this bill. I am for an amendment of the law touching free-delivery cities. I have sat here year after year and seen this law amended from time to time and have seen the cities that had the population prescribed by the law get the free delivery that did not deserve it one-half as much other cities with less population, that yielded double the revenue, until I got tired of that kind of thing.

I undertake to say the best proof that a city needs the free-delivery system is the amount of revenue it produces. If you take this list of offices you find some cities of 13,000 or 14,000 people producing far less revenue than other cities of 7,000 or 8,000. The gentleman from Missouri has said if you include cities with 10,000 inhabitants or $10,000 gross revenue you will make the service cost $400,000 more instead of about half or less than half that amount according to the system provided in this bill. Suppose it does? You are but doing simple justice to all the people and all the cities of this country.

If you adopt this law giving the free-delivery system to cities of 10,000 population and producing $10,000 gross revenue you cut out one hundred and ten cities of the United States that ought to have this service with less than 10,000 population, most of them needing the service more than many cities that would get it under this law. Let me call your attention to two or three cases.

Here is the city of Alexandria, containing at the last census 13,600 population, and producing $12,000 gross revenue. Now turn to my own city of Danville, Ill, with 7,700 population in 1880, and producing nearly $15,000 of gross revenue. Then drop down to Freeport, Ill., with 8,000 population in 1880 and producing $19,500 of gross postal revenue.

And so it runs to the cities in Kansas, in Ohio, in Indiana, and in California. If gentlemen will take this list they will find it runs all over the United States. Now, where is the propriety of taking the city of Freeport, Ill., producing a gross revenue of $19,500, and because it only had 8,000 population in 1880 saying it shall not have a free-delivery service, while Alexandria—it is true two hundred years old—with a population of 13,000 and barely $10,000 of gross revenue, receives the service free.

I want to see this bill amended so as to give this service to every city with 10,000 population or producing $10,000 gross revenue, and I am going to offer that amendment if somebody else does not, so as to test the sense of the committee.

Mr. MILLARD. I desire to say a single word as to this bill. I think there is a misunderstanding on the part of some members of the committee as to what the bill really is.

Under existing law this service must be established in cities of 50,000 inhabitants and it may be established in incorporated cities or villages of 20,000 inhabitants and also in places where the postal revenue is $20,000.

Mr. MCKINLEY. But both are not required.

Mr. MILLARD. Both are not required in the existing law. But this bill goes a step further, and says you can establish the service in incorporated villages or cities with a population of 10,000 where the revenue produced is $10,000.

This matter has been carefully considered by the present Postmaster-General and the First Assistant Postmaster-General. It was carefully considered and investigated by the last Postmaster-General; and they both recommend just such a bill as we have before us to-night. Now, supposing you adopt the amendment offered. Here we will say is a town or borough which extends over 10 miles of territory and that town or borough has the requisite population to entitle it to this service; but you require two dozen carriers to carry the mail over the territory of 10 miles. Therefore we say this bill comes squarely within what is recommended by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON. But all the time there runs the discretion on the part of the Postmaster-General not to put the service over a territory of 10 miles square. But you propose to deprive him of his discretion for our fast-growing Western cities and villages unless they have the 10,000 population.

Mr. MILLARD. In reply to that I want to say that under the present law we have one hundred and seventy-eight letter-carrier offices. This bill will extend the service to forty-three more offices at an expense of $115,000, but if we adopt the amendment, as has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], it will increase the expenditure by $300,000 and make it almost impossible to establish the service.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will allow me to correct my own statement I will say that instead of extending the service to one hundred and ten it extends it to one hundred and twenty-two cities, and makes the total increased cost resulting from the amendment $366,000; which, with the amount carried by the bill, $115,000, makes the total cost $481,000. Is the House willing to vote this enormous expenditure?

Mr. MILLARD. As I know that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to be right on every occasion, I am very confident that if he will examine the bill carefully he will come to the conclusion that this is the best bill that can be presented under our present circumstances.

Mr. CANNON. I have examined the question carefully in years gone by, and I have always found that cities in the older parts of the country get the free delivery, though needing it less than the younger and more progressive cities in the West which yield more revenue.

Mr. MILLARD. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, in that one minute I wish to say that in my opinion to make the gross revenue the standard to regulate the giving of this privilege would be an unwise step. Because you have a large amount of gross receipts at a certain post-office it does not necessarily follow that by giving that office free-delivery service you would accommodate the greatest number of people. In my own city of Hartford I have no doubt that three-fourths of the annual revenue comes from a few firms and corporations whose offices are located within 30 rods of the post-office, but the free-delivery system is more for the benefit of citizens generally who live in more remote parts of the city and who can not afford to have letter-carriers of their own as many of the corporations do. I would be glad to vote for the free delivery in the city of Danville, Ill., or in any other place where it seems to be required, but I do say that it is a mistake to argue that because an office has a large revenue therefore it should have the free-delivery system.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is ended on this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; I move to amend so as to require 12,000 population instead of 10,000. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order. The Chair has already stated that there are two amendments pending. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to withdraw his pro forma amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask unanimous consent to perfect that amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. I renew the pro forma amendment withdrawn by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. BURROWS. All right.

Mr. HEPBURN. In lieu of the amendment that I have offered I now move to strike out, in line 18, the words "and at which place," and insert the words "or at any place where."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois on the left [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 11, noes 91.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and the amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

Several MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and amendments be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. FELTON. I object.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to know whether the amendment that I have offered is now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It is, and will be put to the House at the proper time.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7536) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 7536; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the paragraph last under consideration in Committee of the Whole and all amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman had better make the time a little longer.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment, and to be heard five minutes upon it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The committee has a number of bills to bring before the House and only a limited time this evening in which to do it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] by striking out "ten minutes" and inserting "thirty minutes."

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. HEPBURN). Say twenty minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I modify my motion so as to name twenty minutes instead of ten, as proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEPBURN it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 40, noes 58.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. DOCKERY to limit debate to ten minutes.

Mr. OATES. Does that cover only pending amendments?

The SPEAKER. All amendments pending or which may be offered under the rules.

The motion of Mr. DOCKERY to limit debate was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. DOCKERY that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCH in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7536) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the section now under consideration and all amendments thereto has been limited by order of the House to ten minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer an amendment to be pending, and I wish to be heard upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8 strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen," so as to read "a population of not less than 15,000."

Mr. HEPBURN. I raise the point that the amendment just read is not in order at this time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is simply read as part of my remarks, that it may be pending when the proper time comes.

Mr. Chairman, I have found myself unable to agree with the majority of my colleagues on the committee as to the propriety of this bill. Whenever the people of a town or city find it economical to employ a carrier for themselves, instead of each family or each business man going or sending to the common post-office for mail matter it would be good economy, probably, for the Government under such circumstances to establish a public letter-carrier system. I think that is the rule which ought to govern. I am not at all certain, however, that it would be good economy for the citizens of a town of 10,000 population to employ at their own expense, if they were authorized to do so, a public letter-carrier, or perhaps two or three such carriers.

But that is not the principal reason which will govern my vote on this bill. We have been reducing the revenues of the Post-Office Department right along by reducing the postage on letters and newspapers and by other means until we find the annual revenues falling short of the expenses by something near $5,000,000. I am therefore opposed to increasing the expenses of the Post-Office Department in any direction whatever, unless that expense be provided for by an increase in the postal revenues in some way so that we shall not be obliged to tax the whole people in order to supply deficiencies incurred in affording accommodations in which, as in this case, only a few of the whole people are concerned. If this bill could be accompanied with some provision increasing the general revenues of the Post-Office Department by an increase in the postage on some classes of matter upon which I think it is now quite too low I should not object to the measure. But under present circumstances I think that if we extend this letter-carrier system to towns or cities of 15,000 population we are going quite far enough. We must provide for this expenditure in some way out of the general Treasury, because it is certain that the postal revenues this year will again fall short of the expenses of the Department by several million dollars.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman's proposition reaches to only one town.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The Postmaster-General has now authority under the law to extend the free-delivery system to cities not already provided with it. But I state the general principle which governs me. I am not willing to increase the expense of the Post-Office Department when that expense must be provided out of the general Treasury instead of being provided by the postal revenues of the country. If you will make provision for the expense out of the postal revenues, I will not object to the bill or vote against it. At the proper time I wish to have my amendment voted on.

Mr. MORRISON. Is there any town or city of 10,000 inhabitants where the revenues do not pay more than the expenses?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The revenues of such offices very likely do pay, but not including free delivery.

Mr. LOUTTIT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We can not separate cities or towns of 10,000 and count their revenues alone and say they pay. You have to take these in connection with the whole service.

Mr. LOUTTIT. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will.

Mr. LOUTTIT. If you propose to make your basis population without reference to revenue of cities——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Fifteen thousand population and $10,000 revenue.

Mr. LOUTTIT. If you make the basis 15,000 population and if you say ten thousand postal revenue, there must be a population of 15,000 no matter what the postal revenue may be.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Ten thousand dollars is the amount of the postal revenue.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, among the early days of this session of this Congress I introduced a bill covering in language exactly the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB]. In the wisdom of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads it was determined the basis of the extension of the letter-carrier service should be to cities of 10,000 population and $10,000 revenue. I am free to say, while I did not or do not fully agree with that proposition, so willing am I that general postal facilities should be extended to the people of the country, I accept it as a step in the direction of wise legislation.

However, in view of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to state that I believe it would be in the interest of the body of the people in what we might call the smaller cities, if the facilities of letter-carrier service could be extended to them, making the basis the same as is now the law to-day. The statute reads simply that the Postmaster-General may extend the letter-carrier service to cities containing a population of 20,000 or having a gross revenue of $20,000.

I would rather, when we are making a step to convenience the people, extend the limitation and amend the statute, which is as it has been. There I accord with the gentleman from Illinois when I state I believe I would have this enactment put in to read 10,000 population or $10,000 of gross revenue.

It is not a question, to my mind, whether the Post-Office Department pays or not. This whole letter-carrier service renders $1,290,000 clean, clear profit to the Post-Office Department.

Mr WARNER, of Ohio. In how many cities does free delivery pay?

Mr. BINGHAM. And in that number, I say it with pride, my own city contributes a large amount. In that number not more than twelve cities pay what is called local-delivery work or letter-carrier service.

But I do not propose to enter into a general discussion of what does or what does not pay in the Post-Office Department. I ask the man of the West and the man of the South, long distances from the great central thoroughfares of the North, what makes your deficiency of $5,000,000? It is not the letter-carrier service, but the convenience of what is called second-class newspaper matter and what is called fourth-class merchandise matter. Your first and third class matter contributes largely to the service. You do that which the people require when you build up what is called home correspondence.

In the great cities, where this revenue of $1,290,000 comes to the Post-Office Department as a net profit, it does not come from mail matter sent from San Francisco to Philadelphia or New York; that is carried gratuitously; it is all carried without charge; but this great revenue is made up of your letter to your friend within the confines and the limits of the city wherein it is delivered. That is the source of this revenue.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that inasmuch as the remarks of the two gentlemen who have just addressed the House have been in opposition to the bill and consumed all of the time allowed for debate the chairman of the committee be allowed five minutes in reply.

Mr. CANNON. I will consent if you will extend the same courtesy to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not ask consent for debate if further time is asked on the other side. Gentlemen have consumed all of the time on that side already.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the committee to the first section.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee's amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That offered by the gentleman from Illinois on the left [Mr. PLUMB], as modified by the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], was voted down. There is an amendment now in the nature of a substitute for that amendment, offered by the gentleman from Iowa, pending. The first section, however, has an amendment submitted by the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The amendment of the committee was again read.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. If this amendment is adopted will this section be still subject to further amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments to the text will be in order.

Mr. DINGLEY. But will not the amendment to the text offered by the gentleman from Iowa be first in order?

The CHAIRMAN. If it is an amendment to the text.

Mr. DINGLEY. I so understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that it was a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HEPBURN. It was offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois; but as the Chair held it to be not in order as an amendment at that time, as there were two amendments pending. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois having been voted down, I offered mine as an amendment to that submitted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon that statement of the gentleman from Iowa the Chair will submit that amendment to a vote.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18 strike out the words "and at which place" and insert "or at any place where;" so that it will read, if adopted:

"According to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law, or at any place where the post-office produced a gross postal revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 51, noes 69.

Mr. LOUTTIT and Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; if that is the issue——

Mr. BLOUNT. That will block the business for the rest of the evening.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from California can make the point of no quorum. I believe there is a town in his own district which is a beneficiary of this bill.

Mr. LOUTTIT. Yes, sir; I have a town in my district of 10,000 population which turns in a net revenue of $14,000 every year.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. LOUTTIT and Mr. DOCKERY were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 74.

Mr. LOUTTIT. I withdraw the demand for a quorum.

Mr. HEPBURN. I insist upon the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

The tellers again reported—ayes 43, noes 74.

Mr. HEPBURN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. CANNON. I renew it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order at this stage to move that the committee rise?

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. The committee is dividing, and the point of order has been made that no quorum is present. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the call of the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken,	Clardy,	Geddes,	James,

R. 7536) and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. It appears from the roll-call that there are present 146 members—not a quorum. The Chair will cause the names of the absentees to be entered on the Journal.

Mr. SKINNER. My colleagues from North Carolina, Mr. COWLES and Mr. BENNETT, are detained at their rooms by sickness.

The SPEAKER. This is not the time for receiving excuses.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 20, 1886.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY B. CHAPIN, D. D., of New York, secretary of the United States Evangelical Alliance.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting that an appropriation be made in the sundry civil bill for the construction of a supply steamer and tender for the fourth light-house district, a light-ship to be placed off Ram Island Reef, Long Island Sound, and a light-ship to be placed off Grosse Point, Lake Saint Clair, Michigan, authorized by House bill No. 2627; which, together with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a preamble and resolutions adopted by the constitutional convention of Dakota, in session at Sioux Falls July 13, 1886, favoring the admission of South Dakota into the Union and the organization of a Territorial form of government for North Dakota. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Territories, as follows:

SIOUX FALLS, DAK., July 14, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to transmit to you certain resolutions passed this day by the constitutional convention reassembled as by previous order of the convention.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

A. J. EDGERTON,
President of the Constitutional Convention.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Preamble and resolutions unanimously adopted by the constitutional convention for (South) Dakota, in session at Sioux Falls, on July 13, 1886.

Whereas a fundamental principle of our system of government, both Federal and State, is the right and capacity of the people for self-government;

Whereas under the Federal Constitution the Territorial organization was designed only as a temporary and provisional government to prepare the outlying dominion of the United States for admission to the Union as States on an equal footing with the original States;

Whereas under any and every proper test South Dakota has largely outgrown the Territorial condition and by right her people are now entitled to the management of their domestic affairs, to relief from burdensome taxation for the support of her public schools, now maintained by direct levy upon her industries, to a more complete and efficient judiciary system, and generally to the possession and exercise of the right of citizenship enjoyed by every other people of the United States with like qualifications;

Whereas the people of that portion of Dakota Territory lying south of the forty-sixth parallel, having adopted the constitution framed by this convention, and having proceeded thereunder lawfully to establish a provisional State government, the active powers of which are held in abeyance; and

Whereas the early adjournment of Congress holding out no promise of any legislation favorable to the admission of the State of (South) Dakota as established by her people, or to the division of Dakota, so urgently demanded by the people of the entire Territory: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, the members of the constitutional convention for the State of (South) Dakota, do most solemnly reaffirm the doctrines and principles enunciated in the bill of rights of the constitution framed by this convention, and declare it to be the unalterable will of the people of South Dakota, for whom we are delegated to speak and act, that the State of Dakota, unestablished, and awaiting admission into the Union at the hands of Congress, should be so recognized and admitted as a State of the United States without further delay; and

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that the division of Dakota Territory, and the creation out of its vast agricultural area of two States of the Union, is imperatively demanded in the common interest alike of North and South Dakota; and

Resolved, That in the judgment of the members of this convention a due and just regard for the well-known and oft-repeated wishes and petitions of the people of the northern half of the Territory should secure them in their right to the name of "North Dakota," and that Congress should give to that portion of the Territory upon the admission of the State of (South) Dakota or upon the division of the Territory the name of North Dakota; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

A true copy.

JOHN CAIN, Secretary.

Mr. MILLER. Mr President, I hold in my hand a memorial of the Evangelical Alliance of the United States relating to the Chinese question, or rather to the troubles upon our western borders during the past few months, in which great outrages have been perpetrated upon Chinese who were legitimately within our borders.

This memorial from the Evangelical Alliance of the United States has been brought out by the fact that the branch of the Evangelical Alliance in China has forwarded to the alliance of the United States a letter setting forth that the outrages perpetrated upon the Chinese in our country affect very injuriously Americans particularly, and all Christians who are in China or otherwise connected with the cause of education there.

In presenting this memorial, I may say that I present it thoroughly indorsing the sentiments contained in it. My position upon the importation of Chinese labor and of any other contract labor into this country is well known in this body. I have voted for the exclusion of Chinese laborers under the provisions of a treaty now existing with China, and I have voted for the exclusion of the importation of all labor under contract. That is my position. I believe it to be the correct position; but I hold that the Government of the United States is bound in honor to itself and by its treaty obligations to China to see that equal and exact justice is done to all the people of that race who are within our borders under the treaty and according to law; and it has given me pleasure here this winter to be permitted to vote for an appropriation to make good to the Chinamen upon our western borders who were despoiled of their property by the illegal acts of men who, although they were not citizens of the United States, yet were here under our protection and under our laws.

Mr. President, I ask that this memorial and the accompanying letter from the Chinese branch of the Evangelical Alliance may be read at the desk.

By unanimous consent the memorial and accompanying letter were read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The Evangelical Alliance of the United States respectfully shows to your honorable bodies that it embraces Christians of every name who rest their faith upon the Bible; that its chief objects are the promotion of religious liberty and co-operation in Christian work; that it is in harmonious correspondence with similar alliances in Great Britain, France, Germany and various other countries, including China; and that from the Chinese branch this body has received the letter hereto appended protesting against the outrages and massacres which have been perpetrated upon the Chinese resident on our Pacific coast and in some of the interior States.

The American Alliance is asked to call the attention of our Government and people to the wrongs thus done, to the scandal caused thereby to the American character, and to the tendency of the said wrongs if not duly rebuked and atoned for by the National or State Governments to prevent or impair, especially in the Chinese Empire, confidence in the truths of Christianity, in the justice of the American Republic, and in the fidelity of the Government to its international obligations.

This alliance, responding to that appeal, submits to the favorable attention of Congress the views of the Chinese branch, expressed in its own words and on its own responsibility.

In further fulfillment of its own duties and responsibilities as representing millions of loyal American citizens who hold to the truths of Christianity as revealed in the open Bible, and who believe those truths to be the historic basis and only sure bulwark of our civil and religious freedom, this alliance protests against the said wrongs (the repetition of which is threatened), as crimes which the National Government should treat as violations alike of humanity, Christianity, and national faith, as tending to retard throughout the world the progress of Christianity and to endanger the reciprocal international rights and safety of American citizens in the Chinese Empire.

Rejecting the vain attempt to justify or extenuate these crimes on the ground of jealousy of race, difference of religion, or rivalry in the labor market, and looking beyond the reciprocal obligations of treaties and the provocation to retaliate which these crimes offer to the Chinese at home, to the whole duty of Congress in the premises, we respectfully ask your honorable bodies to view this matter in the light of the fact engraven in our history and recorded in judicial decisions that this is a Christian country, and that its Constitution and laws were made by a Christian people. By the venerable custom of Congress inherited by the fathers of the Republic from their colonial ancestors and reverently continued by their descendants, your honorable bodies, the Senators and Representatives of the American people, are daily reminded that you are legislating for a Christian people; and the prayers offered in the two Chambers are responded to throughout the length and breadth of the Republic, that by your endeavors peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.

In accord with the spirit of that petition, we respectfully ask your honorable bodies to take such prompt and efficient action as to your wisdom shall seem meet, providing for the reparation for the past and the security for the future which under similar circumstances we should demand, and which shall befit our character as a Christian people, enhance the dignity of republican institutions, and advance the beneficent progress of Christian civilization.

The alliance is encouraged to believe that these wrongs will receive the attention which is due, in view of the ground taken by the Executive in his proclamation on the subject and in his message to Congress bearing upon the same, and also from the favorable consideration which the indemnity bill has already secured from both your honorable Houses. But the alliance is constrained to urge that the influence of such action as Congress may take will be greatly enhanced by its early consummation.

All of which is respectfully submitted on the part of the Evangelical Alliance of the United States.

JOHN JAY,
W. E. DODGE,
MERRITT HULBURD,
Committee of United States Evangelical Alliance.

NEW YORK, June 28, 1886.

APPENDIX.

Letter from the Chinese branch of the Evangelical Alliance.

PEKIN, April 6, 1886.

To the Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance in the United States of America.

DEAR BROTHER: In view of the outrages recently committed upon the Chinese on the Pacific coast, and also in some of the interior States and Territories of the United States, wherein from many towns all the Chinese residents, without distinction of age, sex, occupation, or character, have been driven from their homes by threats and violence, with loss of property and life; and learning that continued threats of further violence and expulsion of the Chinese are openly made, being countenanced even by some who hold offices of public trust, we feel called upon in behalf of the China branch of the Evangelical Alliance to lift up our protest against such shameful and flagrant crimes, committed against a quiet and orderly people, who had as much right to the positions they occupied and protection in their lawful callings as had those who have so unjustly and cruelly driven them away or taken their lives.

1. We protest against such treatment of the Chinese as in contravention of law and treaty stipulation. The Burlingame treaty provides that the Chinese shall have the same privileges as to residence and trade as are granted to the citizens of the most favored nations. It is therefore the right of the Chinese to be treated with kindness and fairness, as are the citizens of other countries. Shall a people who boast of a conscientious regard for their word and for justice between man and man, and of their hatred of the oppression of the poor and weak by the rich and powerful, remain silent while such violent men disregard and break the plighted faith of the nation, and thus tarnish the fair name of their country, in heathen as well as in all Christian lands?

2. We protest against such treatment of the Chinese as inconsistent with those principles of kindness, hospitality, and justice which belong to all mankind, and which, being implanted in the natural conscience of all, are binding upon all. Still more are they exalted and enforced by the law of Christian charity.

3. We protest against such treatment as deleterious to the interests of Christianity in China. Several hundred citizens of the United States, representatives of the Christian churches in America, are engaged as missionaries, seeking the conversion of the Chinese to the Christian faith. But how can the Chinese look with any favor upon a religion which fails to restrain the people professing it from such inhumanity? How can they fail to contrast such conduct with the teachings of their own sages, which enjoin humanity and kindness in the treatment of strangers from other nations? If the Chinese do not read our Bible, they read our conduct and mark it carefully. The Roman Catholics are foremost in mission work in China. What effect must it have upon their missions when the Chinese read in their newspapers translations of paragraphs from American journals detailing the crimes committed against their people in the United States, and learn that the adherents of the Roman Catholic faith are foremost in these persecutions? After all they have suffered at home from Christian nations through war and the opium traffic, if they now learn that their countrymen abroad are chased out of Christian lands as if they defiled the very soil by their presence, what hope can there be of their conversion to Christianity? Although we ourselves know well it is the want of Christianity that opens the way for such wrongs, the Chinese people can not be expected to make this distinction. The natural course for them will be to look upon the treatment they receive in Christian lands as the proper fruit of Christianity.

4. We protest against such violence and wrong as endangering the persons and property of American and European residents in China. How can we expect Americans and Europeans to enjoy their present liberties, kind treatment, and official protection in China while the Chinese in America are hunted down as wild beasts? It is not in human nature not to resent such injuries and retaliate upon the people which inflicts them, nor can we expect in such resentment that careful distinction of nationalities will be made, but rather that a common hatred will spring up against all who bear the Christian name, and that acts of violence will with difficulty be restrained. Already in Canton the names of Chinese who have been maltreated or killed in the United States are placarded day by day, and threats of reprisals have been made. The ill-feeling will increase and spread to other places unless the outrages are stopped.

We beg you, therefore, in such ways as shall seem most effective, to bring these things before the people of the United States, using your influence also with the Government if necessary, and urge them by every motive of justice, honor, and right, and by their regard for the property and lives of their fellow countrymen and the citizens of other Western nations resident in China, to put a stop to such wrongs. We beg you to use every effort to secure just and equal treatment for the Chinese in America. They are our fellow-men; let them be treated as such. Let those who trample on their rights or destroy their lives be punished according to law and justice. Let ample indemnities be promptly paid. The United States and European Governments have demanded and received indemnities from China for wrongs committed by her citizens; it would ill become the United States when wrongs are committed within her jurisdiction against Chinese subjects to shield herself by saying the local courts are open to them to sue for damages. They are practically not open to them. Besides, the Government of China can only deal with the Government of the United States. If she holds that Government responsible for the violence committed within her jurisdiction is it not just what England or France or Germany would do?

Whatever course the laws concerning Chinese immigration may take, let such Chinese as are permitted by law and treaty to live in the United States at least be treated with the fairness and humanity which becomes an enlightened people to exhibit. We most earnestly desire that those who go to Christian lands should see the light and feel the warmth of Christian love.

HENRY BLODGET,
President China Branch Evangelical Alliance.
JOSEPH EDKINS,
J. L. WHITING,
Secretaries.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present a petition of M. F. Nickerson and 34 other citizens of Delaware, praying for the passage of certain measures pending before Congress; a similar petition of William Allen and 38 other citizens of Delaware; also another petition of James Hayes and 52 other citizens of Delaware on the same subject, and a petition of Patrick Haggerty and 24 other citizens of Delaware to the same effect. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH presented the petition of Henry Bernes and 35 other citizens of the sixth Congressional district of Alabama and the petition of B. Edwards and 35 other citizens of the first Congressional district of Alabama, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public land, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I hold in my hand for presentation to the Senate a large number of petitions from different Congressional districts of Missouri, all of them I believe asking for the passage of the eight laws. I wish to make a statement in regard to these petitions, and I think it my duty to do so.

These and similar petitions which have been received by the Senate—and I have presented a great many of them myself—come to me from Mr. Ralph Beaumont, "chairman of the national legislative committee of the Knights of Labor." I have examined these petitions, and I find that I am not acquainted with any of the parties whose names purport to be signed to them, and I am very strongly of the opinion that the petitions have been prepared by one and the same person. I am confirmed rather in this opinion, and I think it is my duty to state it, because among these measures the passage of which is asked by this chairman of the national legislative committee of the Knights of Labor is one for organizing a Territorial government in Oklahoma. I have had put in my hand a communication from the representatives of the Cherokee, Chickasaw, and Creek Nations—Chief Bushyhead, Mr. Porter, and John Chambers, of the Cherokee delegation; Pleasent Porter, of the Creek Nation; D. W. Bushyhead, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation—in which they call the attention of Mr. Powderly, who seems to be at the head of the Knights of Labor in the United States, to these petitions, and remonstrate against their being presented to Congress as an invasion of the rights of the five civilized tribes. In response to that communication Mr. Powderly addressed these gentlemen the following letter:

SCRANTON, PA., July 12, 1886.

DEAR SIR: The petitions you speak of were never sanctioned by me and were never presented to the executive board of the Knights of Labor. You are right in what you say regarding the duty of members of the Knights of Labor. It is not the intention or teaching of that order to rob any people of their lands.

I have forwarded your communication to our agent at Washington with instructions to look into the matter and act for the general order in the matter of adjusting this matter on the basis of justice. The address of the chairman of our committee is Ralph Beaumont, 205 Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, D. C. I would be pleased to have you meet with him for the purpose of explaining the whole affair.

Assuring you that no steps will be taken by the general order of the Knights of Labor that will injure your people, I remain

Very truly yours,

T. V. POWDERLY,
General Master Workman Knights of Labor.

D. W. BUSHYHEAD, Esq.,
Principal Chief Cherokee Nation, Washington, D. C.

About the merits of this controversy or these statements I know nothing, but I deem it my duty to state my impression in regard to these petitions. I express no opinion as to the merits of the legislation which is demanded, but I have simply to say that I do not know any of these petitioners and the petitions seem to be in the handwriting of one and the same person. I present them to the Senate for such action as they may deem proper, together with this correspondence, which ought in justice to the gentlemen who have corresponded with Mr. Powderly to be made public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions with the accompanying communications will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BERRY. I present two petitions from citizens of Arkansas, praying for legislation of various kinds similar to those presented by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Alabama. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL (for Mr. MCPHERSON) presented the petition of John L. Suess, brevet major United States volunteers, praying to be allowed an additional pension for the limited period of three years; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE OFFICIAL REGISTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 89) providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. MANDERSON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to said joint resolution, and agree to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8738) to so further amend section 3362 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and section 3363, as makes a distinction in the mode of packing and selling cut tobacco, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The joint resolution (H. Res. 181) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Southwestern Iowa and Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldiers' Association, at Bethany, Mo., and to the Tri-State Veterans' Association of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, for reunion purposes, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee has instructed me, in accordance with its well-established and oft-published action for the last two sessions of Congress, to report the joint resolution back to the Senate adversely and to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed.

There are no tents, and there have been no tents which could be loaned for any purpose. If the War Department is directed to loan these tents we must make an appropriation for their purchase, for without their purchase there can be none to loan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be postponed indefinitely.

R. 1059) granting a pension to Joseph Romiser, reported it back with the recommendation that the bill do pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2156) for the removal of the charge of desertion from the record of Martin Murphy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the fortification appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask an order of the Senate to have printed the testimony taken by the Committee on the District of Columbia relative to the investigation ordered by a resolution of the Senate on the gas question in this city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reports favorably a motion to print certain papers for that committee. If there be no objection the order will be made. The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sales of desert lands, and for other purposes; asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COBB, Mr. STONE of Missouri, and Mr. PAYSON managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5878) to amend the act entitled "An act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 118) relative to certain papers in the State Department by error.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. EVARTS and Mr. SEWELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is in order.

Mr. CHACE. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2600.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me? I have a telegram from the Interior Department which renders it necessary for me to ask unanimous consent for the passage of a small bill which was reported yesterday morning.

Mr. CHACE. Can you not wait for me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2600, which was read in full yesterday.

Mr. MILLER. I move to take up the oleomargarine bill first, and then I will waive the consideration of that bill informally.

Mr. CHACE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, the Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT POLICE REGULATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of the oleomargarine bill the Senator from Rhode Island asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2600) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to make police regulations for the government of said District.

Mr. MILLER. This is brought up by unanimous consent, subject to objection, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the substitute reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MILLER. The amendment was read at length yesterday, and went over when an amendment to it was offered. It need not be read again. If the bill can be passed now without objection, let it be amended and passed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I propose an amendment to the bill. Beginning with line 11 of the proposed amendment reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I move to strike out all down to and including the word "day," in line 14, as follows:

Second. Concerning the observance of Sunday in the carrying on of business in the District of Columbia, to designate what places may be kept open or shall be closed on that day.

Mr. CHACE. I accept that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to add at the end of clause 7 of section 1—

To regulate the keeping and running at large of dogs and fowls.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN SCHOOL BUILDING.

Mr. DAWES. The bill to which I alluded a moment ago is the bill (S. 2855) to authorize a change of location of a certain Indian school building in Washington Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. I have no objection to the bill. I think, however, when it is disposed of I must ask the Senate to go on with the oleomargarine bill.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to erect the school building to be furnished Tonasket and his people, under agreement made with him July 7, 1883, and ratified in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1884 (23 Stat., page 79) at some suitable place in what is called Antoine Valley, Washington Territory, instead of at Buonaparte Creek, as provided for in said agreement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES D. WOOD.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 6337) for the relief of James D. Wood. It is a House bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is all right.

Mr. MILLER. If it leads to no discussion I shall not object.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay James D. Wood, late captain and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers in the war of the rebellion, $133.50 cents, being the value of a horse and equipments lost in action at the battle of Chancellorsville, as found by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others; and

A bill (S. 2800) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers by the Ohio Valley Railway Company.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HERBERT, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. HARMER the managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of "general-service clerks," and "general-service messengers" in the Army.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8023) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the municipalities of Menominee, Mich., and Marinette, Wis., over the Menominee River; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BRIDGE AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.

Mr. McMILLAN. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion can not be entertained.

Mr. VEST. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry, please. Under the rule under which we are proceeding now I can not move, as I understand, to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can only be taken up by unanimous consent, as another bill is pending.

Mr. MILLER. The time will come, I suggest to the Senator, in a day or two when the Calendar will be in order.

Mr. VEST. I give notice that as soon as I can make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill I shall certainly do it.

BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. LOGAN. The other day when the bill (S. 2516) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., was reached on the Calendar I objected to its consideration, but since that time I am told by the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], whose constituents are interested in the bill, that there will probably be some agreement about it. So I withdraw the objection I made in order to give those gentlemen an opportunity of making whatever arrangement they can to take the bill up when it is reached, and that my objection may not obtain further to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. EVARTS. I can hardly say that I concur in the bill, but I understand the point——

Mr. LOGAN. I am not proposing that the Senator shall concur in the bill. I do not mean that. I mean that I allow my objection to be withdrawn for the present, so that the Senator from New York, whose constituents are interested, and the other Senators who are interested, can make arrangements in reference to the bill, if they can agree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now on the Calendar and is subject to motion at any time. The oleomargarine bill will be proceeded with.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9726) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for prior years, and for other purposes, to report it with sundry amendments. I give notice that unless the sundry civil bill is called up to-morrow morning, I will seek to call this up.

BUTTER AND OLEOMARGARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter; also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EVARTS. My friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], in accordance with a suggestion which he made near the adjournment last evening, has said he would now address the Senate, and I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, while the power of taxation conferred upon the Government of the United States by the Constitution is unlimited in its terms it is very clear to my mind that the Government of the United States has no right to collect more money by taxation than the amount necessary to an efficient and economical administration of the Government.

This necessary tax may be raised exclusively by a tariff upon imports, or it may be raised by an internal-revenue law, or the Government may, as at present, use both means of taxation to raise the amount actually necessary for the proper administration of the Government.

For almost half a century prior to the commencement of the late unfortunate civil war our fathers collected the necessary revenue, not by internal taxation but by laws imposing a tariff upon imports.

This, in my opinion, is the better mode of raising the necessary revenue, and this has been the judgment of the American people during the greater portion of the existence of the Government.

The internal-revenue system has been used in emergencies, as in case of the war of 1812, when a system very similar to the system adopted during the late war was put into operation, but the law was repealed within about three years after the termination of the war.

The present internal-revenue system was adopted on account of the necessities of the Government during the late war, and as a war measure. In my opinion, it should have been discontinued before this time, and it should now be discontinued at the earliest practicable period. I will not vote for the present bill, because it increases the classes of property made subject to the internal-revenue system. I will vote on all proper occasions where the vote is likely to avail anything to repeal the internal-revenue system in whole, and if that can not be done, in part. I favor tariff legislation to raise the necessary revenue so adjusted as to protect American labor and foster American industry by discriminating in favor of American productions and labor as against foreign productions and labor. In other words, I would raise the revenue by imposing a tariff upon such imported articles as are raised in this country, so as to foster American industry and protect American labor while raising revenue for the support of the Government. And I would put upon the free-list, wherever the revenue could be spared, such articles as are raised abroad which can not be raised in this country. This much for the general and safe rule as I understand it on this question. Now a few words more as to the measure before the Senate. The object of this bill seems to be to impose a tax on oleomargarine of 5 cents a pound for the purpose of protecting the butter which is the product of the dairy.

But judging from all the publications with which members of Congress have been flooded for months past the true object is to tax oleomargarine or butterine out of existence. Ten cents per pound was asked for. Five cents is in the bill as it came from the House. Why should this be done? We are told that it is necessary to pass such a law in order to save the dairy interest from ruin, as that interest can not bear the competition of the oleomargarine. I will not undertake to discuss the question whether oleomargarine is a healthy article of food. Chemists and scientific men of ability and integrity have pronounced it so. By taxing it instead of exterminating it the Government recognizes it as a wholesome article of food. Then why attempt to tax it out of existence? It is said it is necessary to pass the act to tax it for the protection of the farming class, so as to raise the price of butter in the market. This will also raise the price of oleomargarine. The 5-cent tax imposed upon it will be added to its present market price when it is offered for sale, and the dairymen will raise their butter in like proportion, or probably in much greater proportion.

Now, Mr. President, what will be the effect of this? It is said it will be an act of justice, as it will protect the farming interests of this country.

There are now, say, sixty millions of people in the United States. I think it has been stated here that there are fifteen thousand dairies or creameries, but suppose we say that there are four times that number, or sixty thousand persons or companies having creameries or making butter for sale. That would be only 1 per cent., or one in every hundred, of the population of the country who would get the benefit of the protection under the bill. One person would get the benefit of the protection, the other ninety and nine would have to bear the burden by paying the increased price for their butter. In other words, there is a vastly larger number of people in this country who buy butter than there is who sell butter. Now, Mr. President, notwithstanding the rules I have laid down, which I believe to be sound, if there is any case where I would vary from the rule to protect anybody it would be to protect the farming class of this country. But I can not violate a sound principle or a sound rule to protect a small fraction of the farming class at the expense of the great body of that class; in other words, I can not violate a principle to protect one in a hundred of our fellow-citizens of that class at the expense of the remaining ninety and nine, who are also our fellow-citizens. This is very different from the protection of our home labor and our home industries against foreign labor and foreign industries. If this bill is passed, the creameries of this country, of which many proprietors may not be practical farmers, will get all the benefits of the act. It will protect the butter of the proprietors of the creameries, and if they are farmers, that number of farmers will receive the benefits of the act, but the farmers who raise beef-cattle for sale will receive no benefit from it. In fact, the evidence shows that all farmers of that class will be injured to the extent of two to three dollars a head on their cattle, as the cattle will sell for that much more in the market on account of the use that can be made of part of the animal by manufacturing it into oleomargarine, which would be of but little value for any other use. It will be no protection to the farmers who raise sheep, and it will be no protection to the farmers who raise hogs. A hog would be worth less in the market if no portion of his lard could be used as an ingredient in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

The act will be no protection to the very large class of our farmers who raise corn, wheat, rice, rye, oats, and barley for sale, and the class of farmers who raise beef-cattle, sheep, hogs, corn, wheat, rice, rye, oats, and barley is vastly larger than the small class who maintain creameries and make butter for sale. Then this is not an act to protect the farmers as a class, but it is an act to protect a small class of farmers at the expense of a vast number of farmers, to protect one farmer of the creamery class at the expense of probably one hundred farmers who do not belong to that class, but raise other productions for the market. Mr. President, I have received a great many communications through the mail on this subject, and so far as I have been able to judge of them they came from a few interested parties, who are conducting large creameries, and who have combined their efforts to bring an immense pressure to bear upon the Congress of the United States to foster and protect their interest by a heavy tax on a wholesome article of food, to increase their own gains at the expense of a vastly larger number of farmers. This bill, then, as I understand it, is not a bill to protect the farming class of this country as a class. If it were, I should greatly sympathize with it, but it is a bill to protect a small fraction of the farmers of this country at the expense of the vast majority of them, and against all other classes of the population of this country who use the productions of the dairy, by an increase in the price of butter which benefits only those who make butter for sale, at the expense of all who use it.

It is estimated that if this bill becomes a law it will yield a revenue of probably $10,000,000 or more to the Treasury of the United States, which will be that much collected out of the honest working people of this country, and out of all classes of people who use butter or oleomargarine as food. The tax on the oleomargarine will raise the price of both butter and oleomargarine, and the consumer will have to pay more for it than he now pays. It is a tax, as already stated, upon one American production for the benefit of another American production. It taxes those who use oleomargarine manufactured of American material, and by American labor, for the benefit of those who make butter for sale out of American material and by American labor. This is in violation of every known rule or practice adopted by the Government in raising its revenues. If the additional ten millions of revenue were necessary to the support of the Government there would be a better reason for the passage of the act. But it is not pretended that such is the case.

We now have a surplus in the Treasury, and it is not pretended that we need more revenue. Congress may in its wisdom take ten millions off of articles now taxed and put it on oleomargarine as a simple revenue measure, but it is not proposed to do that. There is no proposition now pending upon which any action is expected at this session of Congress to reduce the present revenues of the Government. No more revenue is needed, and this is a simple proposition to increase the revenue say ten millions of dollars that is not needed, and all for the purpose of protecting one American industry against another. The class in whose favor the discrimination is made is comparatively a small class. The class against whom the discrimination is made is a very large class. It is not the protection of American commodities or articles produced by American labor as against foreign commodities produced by foreign labor, but it is the protection of one class of American production and labor to the detriment of another class of American production and labor.

It is a discrimination between American productions and American labor for the benefit of the few against the many. It is said that the oleomargarine is manufactured of such material and so colored that it is very difficult to distinguish it from butter, and that this close imitation of butter operates as a fraud upon those who buy it, as it is often sold for butter. I am willing to vote for stringent laws applicable to the District of Columbia and the Territories, where Congress has jurisdiction of such questions, and I would like to see laws passed and enforced in all the States to compel the manufacturers and venders of oleomargarine to label it as such, so as to inform every purchaser of the fact that it is such when he makes the purchase. But I am not willing to attempt to tax one wholesome article of food out of existence because it may sometimes be sold for another and different article of food. The proper remedy, in my opinion, is to compel the manufacturer and vender of the imitation article to sell it for what it really is, and not attempt to tax it out of existence.

The same rule would apply to inferior butter which by the use of coloring matter appears to belong to the higher grade of butter, when in fact it is of the lower grade. It seems to me that he who by artificial coloring of a very inferior article of butter sells it in the market for the finest article is as much guilty of fraud as he who colors oleomargarine in like manner and sells it for butter, when it is so close an imitation that those who use it can not tell the difference. I should think there would be as much propriety in requiring the manufacturer and vender of inferior butter, which by the coloring appears to be the superior quality, to label it as "Second class butter, colored," as there would be in requiring the vender of oleomargarine to label it as such.

The law against fraudulent imitations should, I think, be the same in both cases.

For these and other reasons which I might mention I can not vote for this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the invention of this new substitute for butter is working a revolution. It is not one of the ordinary competitions of trade. It is a complete revolution. The new product is said to be nutritious and as good as butter. I suppose that it is, in most cases, at least, harmless; I suppose that in most cases it is nutritious. But the patents as recorded in the Patent Office are not agreeable reading. There is a great variety of them. There are chemicals used in the processes in many cases that we certainly do not look upon with favor when we reflect upon their use in compounding a substance that is put on our tables to eat. As nearly as I can judge from the reports of various chemists, it is not less digestible and wholesome than butter to the extent to which stearine is found in it in excess of the degree in which it is found in ordinary good butter.

The right to make and sell this new substitute when it is honestly made nobody doubts, nobody denies. If the straightforward, honest manufacturer of it produces a wholesome article, nobody denies the right of manufacture, and we do not desire to suppress it. I know the demand is made in some places that legislation be such as absolutely to suppress the manufacture and sale. That is an unreasonable and excessive demand to which Congress has no right to yield; it has no constitutional or moral right to so yield.

As to the further request that is made for the protection of the dairy interest, I respectfully beg leave to say that is not entitled to so much consideration as some of our farming friends seem to think, because they must run the risk and bear the burden of an honorable competition in their business as all other manufacturers must.

The true issue is to a considerable extent evaded in this discussion. It is often misstated. Let us, for the sake of the argument, lay aside all consideration of the manufacturer of oleomargarine, all consideration of the dairymen.

I hold that the rest of mankind, the remainder of the population, the 58,000,000 out of the 60,000,000, have a right to know what they are buying. You say the same applies to a great many other things, that it applies to coffee and sugar and spices, &c. So it does. But if this were not what I call it, a revolution, a most extraordinary and exceptional case, I should not be in favor of legislation of this sort, and I confess that the pending propositions did not at first blush recommend themselves unreservedly.

The manufacturer of oleomargarine sells it to the wholesale dealer. There is no deception or fraud there. The wholesale dealer buys for distribution to the retailers, knowing precisely what he buys. He is not overreached in the matter of price, because he goes from Mr. Armour to somebody else—from manufacturer to manufacturer—until he gets oleomargarine at a satisfactory price and of a satisfactory quality. The retailer, the grocer who buys for retailing to the customer and consumer, is in no danger of being defrauded. He knows what he is buying from the wholesale dealer, and he can go directly past him, if he chooses, to the great manufacturer. He knows precisely what he is buying.

Where, then, does the wrong come in? It is impossible to suppose that every grocer in the United States will sell oleomargarine for what it is. I hear of grocers who will not keep it at all. There are those who frankly tell their customers what it is. It is a painful thing to say, but I am afraid it is a fact, that a large proportion of those who buy it to sell at retail sell it as butter.

The wrong comes in, then, not in the competition above the retailer and the consumer, but in the fraud committed upon the American citizen at large—upon him who is the final purchaser and the consumer. He has the right to know what he is buying. In this is the strong element of the argument in favor of this bill. The practical effect of this invention is to offer a premium of 100 per cent. above the cost of the article—an enormous premium—tempting to dishonesty, and the inevitable effect of it is dishonesty. It is not a petty and contemptible fraud like that committed often as we suppose in markets to the extent of a penny or two a pound, but it is a fraud of 100 per cent. in the cost of the article, a universal fraud all over the country.

I do not deny the right to make it and to sell it, but no man has a right to tell a lie. To make a profit of a lie is to swindle.

If this article is really an honest article and a great benefit to the country I think the manufacturer and consumer of oleomargarine ought to rejoice over this bill. We require him to advertise; we seek to make the product perfectly familiar to every citizen of the nation. At present the manufacturer is not anxious to inform all people precisely what he is making and precisely where the citizen can obtain it. He does not advertise that the best and purest and freshest oleomargarine is to be obtained at such and such a grocery. Nothing of the sort. You do not hear men calling it as they do in the street "strawberries," "fresh fish," "oranges"—"here is the latest and best oleomargarine."

The man who carries the oleomargarine to market is as secret about it as possible, and he is very much offended if we require a sign to be set up in the grocery, "oleomargarine sold here," or if we require a label to be put on each individual package, "oleomargarine" or "butterine." He differs from all the rest of the dealers of the country. Now, we simply compel him or attempt to compel him by this legislation to advertise his business.

The consumers are the victims; the men who purchase in small quantities for actual consumption are the victims.

I think this bill will have a tendency to reduce the price of oleomargarine to the poor who, we are told, are to be blest by its cheapness and its nutritious qualities. Against the bill it is argued that it interferes with the right of the poor to have a wholesome article of diet at a reasonable price. I think it will work in the other direction. I think that, even after paying the 5 cents tax, the odds are that the article will be offered more cheaply to the consumer than it is now.

It is said that we are attempting to discourage an honest industry. I think not. But the discouraging effect of a tax is often recognized, is often welcomed, as a legitimate element of a tax.

The power to tax is practically unlimited save by the common sense of the legislator and the judgment of the people back of him. It is one of the first requirements of the economist, in studying taxation, that it should be levied first of all upon articles, not of necessity, but articles of luxury, or articles whose use and consumption are of doubtful value, or, some say, positively pernicious—for example, whisky and tobacco.

Outside of the actual producers themselves, among the great mass of the people, I do not know who grumbles about the tax on whisky and tobacco. Those of us who smoke a cigar reflect that we pay perhaps the third of a cent or a trifle over one-third of a cent upon each cigar to the Government of the United States. Who complains? Would the tax of 90 cents a gallon—a tax of 300 per cent. on whisky and alcohol—be submitted to as cheerfully as it is now if it were laid upon some wholesome and altogether nutritious, useful, and honest article?

The tax upon whisky is in reality too high. I say this not with any sympathy for the manufacturer, but because any tax so high as to give a temptation to and provoke fraud, to afford a constant incentive to fraud and crime, is a tax too high. The judgment of this country would not permit a tax of 90 cents a gallon on whisky were it not for the moral sentiment that comes in there and colors the whole transaction. Whisky has no friend. They say let it be taxed, it is not a necessity for the poor man or the rich man, save to the comparatively limited extent to which it is needed as a medicine.

We are told that State legislation should care for these matters. I confess that is a very strong argument to me. I wish it were possible to believe that State legislation could do it, but some States legislate very imperfectly, and if I am not mistaken a majority of them do not legislate at all. I ask the chairman of the committee——

Mr. MILLER. About twenty States have legislated.

Mr. HAWLEY. About twenty States have legislated more or less imperfectly. It affords me satisfaction, as it always does I am happy to say, in speaking of the legislation of Connecticut, to say that that State appears to have done vigorously and reasonably all that is possible, not to destroy entirely what is called an honest manufacture, but to protect the consumer, which I insist is the strong point to be held in view here constantly.

Various acts have been passed in Connecticut. They have all been revised and condensed in an act that was passed at the last January session of the existing Legislature. Its language is in the introduction similar to that of this bill:

> Any article resembling butter in appearance and not made wholly, salt and coloring excepted, from the milk of cows, shall be imitation butter within the meaning of this act.

None shall be sold except under these conditions—I do not read the act fully: "The seller shall maintain in plain sight, over" the door or his grocery a sign bearing in plain, black, Roman letters, not less than one-half inch wide and 4 inches long, on a white ground, the words "sold here," preceded by "the name of the imitation article," and if it is sold from a "wagon, or other vehicle, such vehicle shall conspicuously bear such a sign." Upon every package shall be a similar label, and, moreover, "the seller shall orally inform each buyer at each sale that the article he buys is not butter, and shall give the buyer the name of the imitation article;" and "no baker or vender of food shall sell any article of food containing imitation butter unless" he shall maintain the same sign I have previously described. "No keeper of a hotel, boarding-house, or restaurant, temporary or permanent, shall furnish any guest with any imitation butter" without having it made known by a sign "imitation butter" or "oleomargarine used here."

The State further provides for the appointment of a dairy commissioner, and gives him a salary and the right to appoint deputies, who shall have the right to examine all places suspected of dishonest dealing in this article. The State agricultural chemist—for we have an experiment station such as it is sought to establish in all the States by a pending bill—is required to examine all samples duly presented, and proper penalties are inflicted upon dishonest dealing. But this legislation does not fully protect the consumer in Connecticut, nor do I see that any will unless we resort to our power under the national Constitution to tax the article and provide for an inspection similar to that imposed on tobacco and whisky. I am willing to vote for it.

There has been a singular movement made lately in this vicinity, a very determined and energetic—not to say desperate—attempt to couple with every pension act a tax that shall provide the money for paying that pension. It seems to me there is a curious analogy and a curious comparison to be made between that bill and this. It is very singular indeed if a tax is intended to discourage a production that there should be a tax provided for each pension case, as if to discourage the payment of pensions.

I am not exceedingly troubled by the constitutional question which has been raised here, because my reading shows me that the power of the Government to tax for the common defense and general welfare is virtually unlimited save by our responsibility to the citizens who sent us here.

I am perfectly well aware that there may be wild and foolish constructions of the expression "for the common defense and general welfare," and that Congress may attempt to bring within the purview of Federal legislation nearly all that is attempted, and rightfully, by State Legislatures. This is a matter for the discretion and the judgment of the legislative body and of the courts and of the people. If there be an obvious evil, a general, universal evil that can not be reached by the States within their own limited jurisdiction—a jurisdiction complete within their own territorial limits for many purposes—if it can not be reached by the several States, and is one of universal interest and importance, I shall, with care and hesitation, to be sure, but I shall in many cases (and I think this is one of them) be willing to have the Federal Government take it in charge, not by way of depriving the States of their control, not by way of interfering (as in this case we do not) with any legislation the States may see fit to enact, but for the purpose of carrying out and perfecting and acting in harmony with them.

There is nothing new whatever in concurrent jurisdiction in the matter of taxation—in the imposition of taxes, if you choose—upon the very same identical article. There is no lack of harmony between the standing Federal legislation concerning whisky and tobacco and the legislation of those States that heavily burden intoxicating liquors. So a majority of the States—I know best about my own—have burdens imposed upon the retailer of ardent spirits, taxation concurrent with the taxation of the Federal Government, and they feel no embarrassment in that respect.

The strong appeal to the popular judgment that this bill makes is because it is plainly and obviously in the interest of common honesty, a protection of the great mass of the people against an almost inevitable fraud, a fraud that without legislation is certainly altogether inevitable.

That is all I care to say. I shall vote for the bill, not as enthusiastically as I have for some bills, but because I believe it to be necessary, justifiable, and constitutional protection against dishonest practices, toward which there is a most extraordinary temptation.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the bill imposes a tax on property and requires a license to be obtained in order to pursue the business of selling or disposing of that property. The questions which arise in connection with it are certainly important ones and ought to be carefully considered. Before I give my vote upon it, I desire to state the questions which have impressed me with regard to it.

These questions are first whether or not the power to lay this tax is conferred on the Congress of the United States, and as to the effect it will have on the State governments and the powers conferred upon them. To my mind the Constitution is quite plain on the subject of the power and authority of Congress. Its language is that Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excise." This is a tax, and can not be regarded as otherwise than a tax. The power of Congress is plain and distinct.

The object for which the tax is provided is a very different question and one which does not concern the exercise of the power of Congress to levy and collect a tax. The appropriation of the money when collected will be in the hands perhaps of a different Congress. In the contemplation of the Constitution, the act of appropriation and the act of levying and collecting are manifestly distinct and have no direct relation to each other.

The objects for which public moneys may be appropriated after they are collected have been the subject of great discussion and great controversy. But this does not concern in any manner the subjects of taxation. The power of Congress to levy and collect taxes, imposts, and excises is not limited in reference to the subjects of taxation or the kind of property which may be taxed. There can be no question in regard to that. Hence to my mind there is no ground to doubt the entire constitutional power of Congress to levy and collect a tax upon this property or to require a license for this pursuit any more than any other. Indeed this proposition is quite fairly admitted in the report which was read by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] made by Mr. RANDOLPH TUCKER, which says:

> To use the tax when needless for revenue, merely to strike down a product or an industry, is to abuse the constitutional trust.

This is quite as true if we leave out the words "merely to strike down a product or an industry" as with them. It is certainly an abuse of the trust to use the taxing power when needless for revenue, without any other qualification. It is certainly an abuse of the taxing power to use it to strike down or to suppress or deal injuriously with any property interest whether or not the money is required for revenue. This quality attaches to every exercise of power granted under the Constitution, and no more to this than to any other. All of them are subject to abuse and misuse, but this fact is no argument against the existence of the power.

The distinguished gentleman who is the author of this report in the House which was read by the Senator from Kentucky further says:

> If I could bona fide vote for this tax in order to raise needed revenue I would feel justified in doing so under constitutional sanction. But if my purpose is to strike down this business, and seeing I can not do so without an invasion of a clearly reserved right of the States I should use the tax to destroy the product and not to make it bring revenue, I should feel I had violated the Constitution by a disingenuous method which could not delude others nor successfully quiet my conscientious reproaches.

> I concede that Congress, as all other political bodies having the tax power, may among the infinite variety of taxable subjects discriminate as to those which a wise public policy indicates as best fitted to bear the burdens. Between luxuries and necessaries, between articles owned or consumed by all and those owned or consumed by a few, between useful and useless, healthful and hurtful objects, we may discriminate when we need revenue and come to lay a tax to raise it. But no author of legal merit has ever said that when we do not need revenue at all we have the right to tax a man merely to reform his life or suppress his business. The power to tax sleeps until the need for revenue awakes it to action; and when it acts, it may wisely discriminate, as already shown.

These propositions made by the distinguished gentlemen who oppose the passage of this bill admit fully and entirely the constitutional power to levy and collect this tax. They admit also the expediency of discriminating between one species of property and another in the imposition of a tax. The power to tax exists quite as much when the revenue is not needed as when it is. The existence of a power can not in any sense depend on the necessity for its exercise. The right use of the power depends on the necessity for its exercise or public advantage to result from its use.

Upon these points, therefore, I think there need be no controversy. The power to levy and collect this tax is very clear. There is no limitation in the Constitution. It is not provided that Congress may lay and collect taxes provided they are not oppressive to one industry more than another, provided they do not interfere with the law or the policy of the States is this or that respect. These words can not be interpolated in this grant of power and as to these questions they are questions of expediency and not questions of constitutional power.

Mr. President, I am of the number of those who believe that it would be expedient, if any discrimination is made between subjects of taxation, to discriminate against those things which are hurtful and in favor of those which are beneficial. But I have no doubt that the provision of the Constitution requiring taxes and excises and imposts to be uniform throughout the country was intended to provide that there should be no discrimination between the values of the country, that each and all should bear its just proportion of the burden of taxation. But the language of the Constitution refers alone to the uniformity of the tax, not to the uniformity of its effect. It would have been wise, and it is wise no doubt in every system of taxation, to impose its burden in relation to value, to make the tax a burden upon property according to the value of the property, to make it rest most heavily upon those who own most largely and are best able to pay.

But these are not the provisions which are called in question here. We are asked to consider the effect of this tax and that it is a question entirely within the competency and a proper subject for consideration by Congress. The inexpediency of a tax, the hurtful character of a tax may be equal to a constitutional inhibition; and the great point in the imposition of taxation is to consider how far the tax may be an injury or a benefit, how far it may be unequal and oppressive upon one class of values, or how far it may be destructive of other powers and other rights created by different departments and organisms of the Government—rights created under and by the States which have complete and exclusive power over the subject.

Mr. President, this tax can not be justified by the argument that it will promote the health of the people in the States; for that is a subject upon which power is reserved in express terms to the States, and has always been so decided; and the reservation of this power exclusively to the States is an essential and chief feature of the Constitution and the form of government under which we live.

We therefore can not properly, we can not expediently exercise the power of taxation with the effect of exercising the function of promoting and protecting the health or the property of the people of a different government, a government under our form of government, equal to our National Government, and subordinate to it only in respect to the specific powers granted to us. And if there be any objection to the taxation imposed by this bill in this respect, it is to its effect, not its purpose, not the motive of the legislator who may vote it—for the powers granted have no concern with the motives of those who have charge of the duty of exercising them—that is an objection which is within the forum of individual conscience, and from the nature of the constitutional or governmental power it can have no concern with the motives of those who exercise it, or with the purposes of a majority or a minority of those to whom it is intrusted, but it relates to its effect. Its exercise is a matter of expediency. But the power being conferred in terms, it must be exercised within the terms of the grant; and as to its effect, whatever effects may follow from the exercise of the power are intended. But as to the expediency of exercising the power of taxation to the end and with the effect of discharging a function exclusively conferred upon the State governments, surely if this Government is worth anything, if the principle of a general government with certain powers and State governments with certain other powers is of value to the prosperity and happiness of this people, certainly if it be a great feature of government important to the protection and growth of all industries and of all personal rights, it would be an extraordinary anomaly that the taxing power can be justified in its exercise with the effect of performing a function exclusively committed to another and a different authority, that is, to the States. That is, a tax should be collected by the General Government not to be used as revenue, but with the effect of regulating the business and protecting the morals and health of the people of the States.

It can not be that this Government can be of any value, that it can perform the great purposes which have been assigned to it, that it can hold the destinies of hundreds of millions of people safely in its hands, and yet it be true that this Government of the United States may properly exercise the taxing power to the end and with the effect of performing a duty intrusted to the State governments or of displacing the functions of the State governments and substituting the laws of the United States or the action or effect of the laws of the United States in place of the action or effect or influence of the laws of the States.

Then it is true that all questions of promoting and protecting the health of the people of the different States are committed exclusively to the people of those States, and that it is no part of the proper function or proper effect of legislation by the General Government that it shall perform any duty intrusted exclusively to the people of the States, nor can it do so, because the policy which they alone are authorized to establish in regard to the protection of any interest may constantly vary and is a matter of discretion with them; and therefore this effect can not be attached to any power exercised by this Government without interfering with that authority and that power on their part. It is no answer to this objection that the people of the States desire this action by the General Government. This would be to affirm that the people of the States desire to change this form of government and give power to the General Government over the health and business of the people of the States.

So, Mr. President, as a matter of expediency we are asked to consider how far the imposition of this tax will have that effect, and wherever it shall come within that limitation, wherever the tax is beyond the purposes of revenue, beyond a just and fair equality with other subjects of taxation, wherever it shall have the effect of prohibiting the existence of a property or a right the creation and protection of which is the exclusive function of the State government, it is a solid and substantial reason equal in potency to any constitutional inhibition of the exercise of power to that extent and in that manner.

Therefore the arguments and propositions upon which this bill is defended, that it will promote the general health, that it will protect a useful industry necessary to the public convenience, are arguments that in themselves, assuming that the preservation of our present form of government with its distinctions is important and valuable, are the most powerful argument that can be addressed to us, that can be conceived and urged against the passage of the bill.

I should myself vote, in adopting a system of taxation for a tax upon liquor and tobacco and oleomargarine, a reasonable and just tax apportioned according to the respective values of these articles, and I should be willing to increase that tax within the limit of revenue purposes and make it as has been the custom of the Government an unequal tax, because I conceive the one to be better for the public than the other. But the moment you transcend the point of necessary and proper revenue in the collection of the tax, that moment in my opinion you assume a position not hostile to the letter, not hostile to the power conferred, but hostile to the existence of these two governments and assailing the principle of a dual government, each sovereign in its own functions and for its own declared and specific purposes.

Mr. President, if this bill could be made a part of a general system of taxation within the purposes, within the limits of the amount needed by the Government for its revenue, I should be very willing to vote for a tax upon oleomargarine and to exempt from tax butter, the product of a widely diffused industry in which a great majority of the farming interests of the United States, not in my own but in other States, are interested, an industry in which a very large number of people of moderate means are most largely interested.

I conceive that the argument urged by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] in reference to the fact that this manufactured product is one easily concentrated in the hands of a few persons, and more or less in the nature of a monopoly, would enable it to bear, and it would be a wise public policy to impose upon it an amount of taxation greater than on other products, and that an exemption which would be in the nature of a discrimination might be made in favor of that product and that property which belongs to the great mass of the people and is necessary to them.

But, sir, by what argument can you justify the exercise of the taxing power in an oppressive manner to one industry or pursuit with the effect of destroying it or imposing unnecessary and very onerous burdens upon it? You tax spirits and you tax tobacco as articles of luxury and not of necessity, as articles hurtful to the general health, and, therefore, the subject of your discrimination; and you tax them unequally, you impose a tax three or four times as great, according to value, as upon other things; but these articles are the most profitable subjects of taxation. You might very well, within the limit of the preservation of any industries, tax any other product or any other property with the same effect and to the same extent. But when you propose to impose a tax, and when the tax will have the effect—for it matters not as to the purpose—of destroying an industry or of oppressing it beyond the limits which it can reasonably bear, then we shall have committed a grave error of public policy and commenced a system of legislation which is a substitute for the exercise of the powers of the State governments over the business and the health and property of these people. The taxing power may be so exercised as to destroy any man's property, or any particular kind of property, or to enrich any particular man or any class of men. Certainly every one will condemn such a use of the taxing power. Yet this is the evident, the admitted and intended effect of this bill, and the policy of it is justified on the ground that it will promote the health and advance the fortunes of the class of farmers who own cows and sell butter.

If you can do that, having the power, which I admit, to do it, if you can justly do it, if we are to exercise the lawful powers conferred upon Congress to the end that a function vested exclusively in the States may be superseded and an industry allowed and created by law in these States shall be injured and another benefited, and the question as to what shall be the policy to promote the public health in the States or the contrary be determined by an exercise of the taxing power here, then surely that taxing power, that protection vested elsewhere, that right of discretion as to how the public health shall be promoted, what property shall exist and what shall not exist reserved to the States, is of no importance in our scheme of government and can be best discharged here, and if by the exercise of any power committed to us we may perform the function which is theirs to the exclusion of their authority, it results beyond a question that we attach no value and no importance to this principle of vesting power for certain ends and over certain objects in one authority and a power for other ends and other objects in another authority. We declare by this action that we have no faith or confidence in the principles on which our Government is founded, and our distrust of its usefulness and efficiency.

Mr. President, this is a conclusive objection. I think it would be wise in the different States to impose a tax upon this manufactured product, to let it bear a higher tax than the native product, than the product which is in the hands and is the property of much the greater number of the people, which seems to be the more healthful of the two. I think that in the General Government, when we impose a revenue tax, we might very well discriminate against this industry, not to the extent of destroying it, while we exempted some that were innocent and more healthful and better. Within that extent and with that limit we might discriminate that this product and this property would justly and properly be the subject of a system of taxation; but is this the bill? The bill imposes a tax of 5 cents to the pound. The bill requires a license. The bill extends the revenue system with all its guards and with the view and with the effect of making it onerous and oppressive upon this industry, upon this property. It is not a bill with the effect of raising revenue; it is a bill excessive in its imposition of burdens upon this property and surrounded with unnecessary guards and restrictions in the nature of license and of a tax for license, a tax for the pursuit of the business, all with a designed effect and having the effect of destroying a property which the State alone has the right to create and the exclusive right to protect or discriminate for or discriminate against.

For that reason I shall vote against this bill, because it is inexpedient, because its policy interferes with the right and the exclusive power and authority of the States, because it destroys and is intended to have the effect to destroy a particular industry, and is intended to have no other effect, and can have no other effect than of destroying a property created under State authority, which the States have the right to create; and for that reason, and that alone, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, for several years before legislation by Congress was contemplated or invoked, the topics that are here considered and the interests of the community that are involved were largely discussed and weighed in the communities and before the Legislatures of many of the States. Whatever may be thought of the wise and just and expedient solution that shall be given to this matter here, it will not, I think, be gainsaid that great advantage has been gained by the discussion to which the subject and the interests have been submitted. Naturally when a great interest, a permanent interest, an extensive interest that touches perhaps the most vital and valuable portion of our common community under our equal laws and under our system, was invaded for whatever reason by such an encroachment upon what was thought to be as stable as the culture of the land, as necessary as the power of labor, though only in the humble sphere of the common milk dealer and the plain farmer—when he was exposed not only to a diminution of his crop, not only to a cloud upon his prospects, but to an invasion of the little property that he owned, an exclusion not only from the employments to which he had been brought up, but from the land which he had inherited or that which he had slowly paid for by the labor of his hands—when this happened, by whatever cause, it could not but excite great attention, cause great distress, and give rise to greater alarm. And for myself in advance I should have supposed that upon the mere statement of that existence of things among us all over this land, whether as affecting farmers who were interested in dairy products or in the cereals or in the fattening of cattle for market or in the raising of any articles for human use, if there could have been some preference of individual rights and interests, everybody would have sympathized with such an interest as this that was thus exposed to danger and to ruin.

I can not think that in the sober reflection of the Senators they or any of them can deem it right or wise to draw a geographical line as to the different profits of farming in different portions of this great and happy land. I do not think that whatever exuberance of wit may belong to any orator or whatever brilliance of rhetoric, he on reflection will wish to aim a shaft of ridicule at so vast an interest, so simple, so honest, so necessary, and so historical in the facts and circumstances of this nation.

So, too, if the progress of science, if the advantages of communication, if all the strenuous rights and interests of this vast nation shall crowd upon, shall degrade, shall embarrass, and shall endanger either this great interest or any other great interest, North or South, East or West, on the Pacific coast or on the Northeast portion of the Atlantic, wherever this body-politic of ours is vital and sensitive, and whatever adjustments may be made, they should be made justly and not by impertinent or intrusive consideration.

Now, the dairy farmers and all that groups around this vast industry would desire, perhaps did desire at the commencement of these discussions—before the country, I mean; not discussions here—that there should be an extirpation of this evil by all the powers of legislation that belong to the States and all the regulations that could be attached by the General Government. In their minds the interference, the disturbance, the simulation, the deception, the fraud was so inseparable from the product itself that it should stamp and contaminate the product itself and it should be proscribed as no longer tolerable under the interest of our community, that the purging of them, the detecting of them, the punishment of them was greater than the benefits to come from it unless there should be an extirpation of the product itself.

On the other hand the manufacturers and producers, the venders of this product desired to be let alone. They wanted to plant themselves upon the lawfulness of trade by the arts and contrivances that should press and promote their sales and be put upon the footing, therefore, of all honest employments, and on the principle of the common law of caveat emptor, that every one must look out for himself in his purchases, and the general propositions of our free system of government that equality before the law and under the regulations of the law should be recognized and enforced, they demanded that they should be left alone, that if the traffic in the fraud and the profit of the fraud, if the injury from fraud to the other competing interests, was inseparable from their advantage of being able to create and make sale of this article, it must stand for this competition, and the fraud must triumph, because there was no power, forsooth, to repress it or redress its mischiefs.

Sheltered under a notion that it was a domestic question for the States to deal with, and feeling the incompetency of the States to deal with it, knowing that they are hampered on all sides by intercommunications with other States, it belonged to the Federal Government to control, and with the foreign market which was wholly under the dominion of the General Government they were willing to play hide and seek over the counters of the groceryman with the police officers and the prosecuting attorneys, and they expected to ride triumphant over these restraints and these rectifications of the frauds.

As respects the General Government they felt themselves safe, not only upon certain recognized views of constitutional law, but under the feeling that the policy and the habit and the disposition of our people in their national legislation was to avoid discouragement and give equal and general encouragement to all the lawful pursuits of trade and industry. Thus they were willing to try conclusions with these two surveillant and controlling powers, knowing that in this contest each must work in its interests and could not triumph over the interest that they meant to maintain.

The progress of this discussion has, I think, brought both the dairy interests and the food-producing fats to confront one another upon an arena and over a dispute that is now narrowed to this: The debatable ground of fraud which one is to perpetrate to the detriment and disaster of the other is the point and is the subject over which these combatants expect to fight and to have their warfare made and disposed of by the powers of government both of the State and of the United States.

Efforts were made in the States to deal with this, and my honorable friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has enabled me to refer, following his instance, to an opinion which I had occasion to give as a lawyer, not on the retainer of either side, for I was never engaged in a controversy under the retainer of either side, but as a lawyer—my opinion of the constitution of the State and of the character of the bill then under consideration in its Legislature. That opinion I may now ask to be treated with some respect, not only because the Senator from Missouri has seen fit to give his encomium to it, but because afterward the high court of appeals of the State of New York unanimously adopted the conclusion.

What was the debate there and what was the conclusion to which the court arrived, and which I had reached in the passage which the Senator from Missouri read? The bill was long; its title gave it the appearance of an interference by fraudulent simulation and deception in the uses which were to be condemned and suppressed; the clauses favored that construction; and the views I took of it were that if it could be construed (and I thought it might be construed) as limiting in all its severest clauses and most exhaustive methods to the extirpation of the fraudulent simulation, however rigorous and pungent the measures of the Legislature might be, it was constitutional; that no court could impose a limit to the magnitude or the reach of its methods to extirpate the simulated and fraudulent sales and corruption of the market; but if the court must come to the opinion that a certain section of that bill was meant to be, and should be construed as, a proscription and suppression of the manufacture of oleomargarine in its own name an unwholesome product and put on the market in that name, it was unconstitutional, and the court arriving at the conclusion that the construction I had sought to give to a statute which had passed, what every lawyer should choose to give possible interpretation, was constitutional; but I so limited that construction as in itself, upon the conclusive proposition that it was a proscription, and that thus it was subject to the denunciation of the provisions of the constitution. The idea had been and was that the powers of government directed to and confined within the extirpation and regulation of fraud was constitutional, but if it went beyond and undertook to extirpate by discrimination between honest and honorable and open methods, it was unconstitutional.

On that discrimination I stand here to-day in maintenance of this bill, which is confined and limited, however severe people may think as to the methods and the sanctions, to extirpating this fraud from the market of this country at large, in its dealings in foreign commerce, in the exchanges between the States of the Union, and in the simulation of dealers here and there promiscuously in the land, although within the States, that this regulation is for that extirpation of the fraud and that suppression of the fraud.

I think the dairy farmers and those who espouse and promote the most intelligently and the most usefully their interests are disposed to recognize this limitation of the thing; and I am glad to think too that the oleomargarine manufacturers and venders are unmasked from any pretensions that they have a right to encroach upon the rights of dairy producers by simulation and fraud, and they must expect, and they must feel that rightfully they must expect, that the law shall pursue, shall expose, shall punish, unless its arm is shortened effectually to that end.

Mr. President, we come a little nearer now to the intervention, and the rightful intervention, of Federal legislation in restraint and extirpation of this fraud. It is not the ordinary matter of the buyer and the seller accomplishing their arts to the disadvantage on the one side or the other of such persons. The wise man has said, how can there be honesty between buyer and seller? I do not propose by Federal legislation, or by State legislation, or by any other means other than religious and moral culture, to extirpate this competition of interests between buyer and seller. Whether the encomiums may be upon the dairy butter and its flavor and its color, or, on the other hand, of oleomargarine in regard to its sincerity, its wholesomeness, and its equality with butter in the uses of the human body, these are not matters which can be controlled by law. But the law, either as enacted and executed in England or in this country, in the States or in the General Government, has never stopped short of an attempt to regulate frauds that were pernicious to the public interest, pernicious not in the dealing between A B and C D in the sale of a tub of butter but in the business of frauds in trade and in the rights and securities of traders by which their just labors and their just interests were undermined by encroaching upon them and by a simulated selling as their products what were the products of others.

It is on this principle that trade-marks are protected now, and energetically, abroad and here. You may invent anything that you can which is useful and will obtain a patronage in the community, but you can not put the name of another upon it, and you can not put the article under the assumption and under the pretension that it is the product of another, not merely of another man but of another industry. The principles, both moral and legal, and as well constitutional, apply to this security by such methods and by such faculties as are at the command of wise people governing wise and honest nations; and this is the principle, and the only principle, that we need to invoke here.

As to these competing interests my colleague has greatly I think to the advantage of the Senate as of myself expanded and truthfully, with research, and with statistics, and with analytic and illustrative comparison, the vastness of these interests. I shall not restate them much, and I shall not recount them. What they are everybody knows. They can not be belittled. There is no interest in this country which can compete with it in sincerity, in importance, or in any single respect. I speak now of the dairy product. It is one of the contributing exports to our balances of trade with Europe, although it can not compare in that market, I agree, with the magnitude of the cotton or of the grains. Yet it is an important element, and one which if stricken out of the list of our foreign commerce will not only affect the interests of those immediately producing and selling but in our exchanges with Europe.

Now, as to the magnitude of the fraud is it one of detail? No. Is it between buyer and seller? Not in the aspect that we are to look at it, not in the interest that invokes us as dealing with the general interests of this country, that we are to hunt up and to punish in police courts these particular frauds. The question is whether by means of fraud on the one hand one great and honest pursuit, one great and honest production, one great and honest trade, one great and honest element in foreign commerce is in its body and its substance attacked by fraud, reduced not only in its gains but threatened in its existence, because unless by vigorous and efficient means the fraud is checked the fraud will take its effect and its effect in all the ways I have indicated.

What, then, is the fraud, on the other hand, besides this new project and this new trade raising itself to a competition that threatens, this great and established industry? How does it do it? How does it get its price that it can comport in price and can comport in uses, and in simulative and deceptive methods in competition with this other? Does it do it on its own merits, and because its cost brings it up to that competition? Is it by the fact that its reasonable profits added to its cost make it a competitor at these prices? Not by any means; if it were put at the low rate of a reasonable and honest butter, worthy of consumption as such by the common consumer, not merely by the wealthy or the well-to-do, but those who make up the population of our country everywhere, the common people, not paupers, not poor, not mendicants, not on the level of the disgraced and degraded populations that make up in great proportion the masses of other nations, but honest, respectable, cleanly, ambitious—ambitious of their own conduct, of their own treatment of others, of their own respect everywhere.

These masses of ours are those who are to be the patrons. If they can not command two pounds a week or one pound a week of honest butter they will have it at such meals as they can afford it and on such feast days as they can keep, but it shall be their butter as they knew it and as they desire it and they are not to be deprived of it. But if you put 20 cents a pound as a reasonable price for honest and worthy butter, whether it shall be tinged by a color that is agreeable or left to its own unaffected tinge, they do not care or know about that. They know that annotto put into butter does not change it from being butter or make it simulate anything that it is not. They do not need instruction. They understand that the butter and not the color is what they mean to eat and what they expect to digest, and they are not deceived, nor is it of importance enough, except for the passing agitation and momentary debate, that we should give attention to that. It is as well understood as if to the lowly on every pound of butter there were printed nimium ne crede colori, or in the vernacular, that it is the butter and not the color that feeds the eater.

How does the competing article come up to be worth and salable in the market at 20 cents, or a near approach to it? Six cents by making, 2 cents by profit, 2 cents by sale, and 10 cents by the simulated form. If it did no more than this it should be suppressed by any wise government that had powers to repress it. But when the measure of this fraudulent simulation goes to the extent of breaking down a sober and slow and regulated industry, that step by step and dollar by dollar and cent by cent, and toil by day and toil by night, by intelligent and sober-minded men and women, must make up in this slow and frugal need of their packages of butter to 20 cents, and this leaps from 10 to 20 cents in the market not by its cost, not by its profits, but by the fraud they sell and reap the benefit of.

I do not speak harshly of this business on the part of those who make and sell oleomargarine, except in this very form that the market made for them is out of the simulated purchase and the deceived consumer. I do not go through the steps, I strike at the fact that if you make the oleomargarine and make it honestly, wholesome and useful, if you please, and sell it as such, then you must sell it at the same ordinary profits that other honest productions under honest sales can command from the community.

If this 10 cents between the fair value of this commodity and the market competition under the simulated pretension of being dairy-butter is to be divided, 5 cents to destroy the butter and 5 cents to defraud the consumer in his estimate that he is paying a fair value for the butter that he buys, there is plenty of room for the 5 cents of this tax to come in without decrying or reducing the market price at an honest estimate and under an honest sale of this oleomargarine product, without the common butter being prejudiced in the market and without its being able to exclude and destroy the rights of oleomargarine dealers.

The attempts by the States were a failure. I do not speak of these contrivers, or manufacturers, as monopolists. It is not because they manufacture on a large scale, it is not on the principle that their manufacture admits of this aggregation. I enter into no crusades against any of the combinations that belong to manufacture for the benefit of the consumers. Every man, rich or poor, is to stand in regard to integrity upon his own conduct. Before the law, thank God, in this country, all stand alike; and thus far the law has been able to regulate the diversities of human affairs by this great principle that the law is equal and the law is just for all.

I have presented remonstrances on one hand and petitions on the other with an equal hand, and it was the right of the petitioners and remonstrants, and my duty to them. So far as any one may stand, I think, equally in these great interests, the city of New York competes even with Chicago in the magnitude of its production of oleomargarine. Certainly the great mart of New York desires for its trade the honest production, that which swells its profits and aggregates its wealth. As the port of exportation it desires all these methods and all these products which swell that trade. I have no interest, and I have no disposition to draw lines of comparison between honest competitions of honest productions, each sold and each competing with the other on its own merits.

Now, about the Constitution. I ought not to occupy much time upon what must be rather a moot controversy, when on all sides it is agreed that the bill as it now reads, if it becomes a law, is constitutional in the eye of the courts. Why should we debate either the doctrines, or the dogmas, or the history, or the traditions, or the divisions between sections of the country and large bodies of political persuasion with rhetoric and with logic that have marked the history of those ever since the Constitution was framed? I understand that when the taxing power was taken away from the States, as it was upon foreign imports, it meant to carry from the States collectively, contributing all that belonged to them in that use of taxation. Does anybody doubt that if New York had remained an independent State, and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania and South Carolina had remained independent States, their power of laying foreign imposts, covered by the uses that they possessed in that province, would have remained? Well, they renounced it all. What they renounced and what they contributed did not change in the process of its passing from the States into the Federal Government.

I have already debated the general doctrine in a former discussion early this session; but, for myself, I have never been able to understand how when the States, possessing all the methods and uses and choices that belong to the imposition of foreign imposts, surrendered them to this nation once for all and forever, the nation did not acquire all that was thus given. I have known—and we pride ourselves upon it—that there has been a division between the Federal and the State powers, but I have never known and have never been ready to admit in logic or in debate that the sum of powers put together did not make us a nation able to contend over the stormy sea of human interests with foreign nations. I do not understand that either of these powers, State or nation, proceeds halting, limping, and laggard in its race with foreign nations in the dominion of the world. There is a particular exception, an extraordinary exception, which has been obliterated from the whole compass of authority of the State and Federal Governments in regard to foreign trade, and that is the export trade. Any export tax is prohibited.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like, for my own information, to get the opinion of the Senator from New York as to taxation. I understood him to say that the General Government upon the formation of the Constitution obtained from the States all the power which was inherent in the States over the subject of taxation.

Mr. EVARTS. As regards foreign imports.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to inquire whether or not there was any limitation upon the power of the States in reference to foreign importations before the formation of the Constitution?

Mr. EVARTS. Not the least.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I want to understand the position of the Senator, and I wish to ask this question, whether he now insists that there is no limitation upon the power of the General Government in reference to taxation?

Mr. EVARTS. As to the power over imports. It has no power over exports; and in regard to excise it occupies common ground with the States.

My point was a simple one, that each State among nations and toward the rest of the world had the full discretion and the full power to use its import tax for the benefit of itself on all considerations that build it up as toward the rest of the world. Now, when they brought it and laid it at the feet of the common nation, surrendering all their power over imports to the whole nation for the good of the whole people so that this might be a great nation ab extra and toward the rest of the world, the power of the nation is complete in this regard.

I do not discuss with those of other opinions how far the right of laying taxes includes, for other reasons than those I have now stated, the right of raising money for the general welfare. I discussed that subject in a previous debate some months ago. But here we are all agreeing that this tax bill is constitutional in the eye of the law. There is no other test of its constitutionality. If it be constitutional in the eye of the law it is constitutional in the eye of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court is the judge of what is constitutional. I am not disposed to disparage the importance of not invading or transcending the principles of discrimination between the authority of the State and the authority of the nation. Within the rule of Senatorial and of Congressional authority in the other House and the power of the President within the range of his inspection over legislation, there may be reasons of good argument and reasons of good decision why you should not crowd upon or trespass upon the debatable region of what attacks the principles of the Constitution or may endanger it too far in this or that direction or going too far in another may predjudice the adjustment and jostle the prosperity of the combined Government; and we look at this bill now to see whether that comes within that contemplation.

I ask attention as to this generality of the power of taxation to a single passage which I will read from section 965, being the first volume of Story on the Constitution:

> The absolute power to lay taxes includes the power in every form in which it may be used, and for every purpose to which the Legislature may choose to apply it. This results from the very nature of such an unrestricted power. A fortiori it might be applied by Congress to purposes for which nations have been accustomed to apply it. Now, nothing is more clear, from the history of commercial nations, than the fact that the taxing power is often, very often, applied for other purposes than revenue. It is often applied as a regulation of commerce. It is often applied as a virtual prohibition upon the importation of particular articles for the encouragement and protection of domestic products and industry; for the support of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; for retaliation upon foreign monopolies and injurious restrictions; for mere purposes of state policy and domestic economy; sometimes to banish a noxious article of consumption; sometimes as a bounty upon an infant manufacture or agricultural product; sometimes as a temporary restraint of trade; sometimes as a suppression of particular employments; sometimes as a prerogative power to destroy competition and secure a monopoly to the government!

I am not therefore talking at large or outside of the book in the general observations I make.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether Mr. Justice Story in the chapter from which he read a section was not attempting to give and professing to give what he states to be the three views of this constitutional power of laying taxes, imposts, and excises, and whether the section from which the Senator read was not a part of the exposition of one of those views rather than the commentator's own opinion.

Mr. EVARTS. The subsequent sections——

Mr. GRAY. I do not know that it was so; I ask more for information; but I do know that the commentator in that chapter undertakes to give a statement of what he calls the three views of this power.

Mr. EVARTS. He states the argumentative views and then states the conclusions.

I only say that this shows that this large and general view I have presented is founded upon a clear interpretation supported by authority, and the action of this Government goes more and more in this direction, that it is a nation, that as towards foreign nations it is not crippled, that it commands powers which belong to Government, attributed and accorded in the Constitution; and then the lines of demarkation are drawn by inhibitions on the States and by restraints on the General Government and the prohibition of common and perfect liberty taken from the substance and mass of powers communicated to the States or to the nation or to all together.

But I wish to say this as a general proposition of constitutional construction, that when what belongs to the general purposes and rights of government and control is looked for, and it is found that the State is incompetent to deal with the actual situation by reason of its being hampered and restricted and thwarted by its being inclosed in the group of States, by what it has parted with to the General Government, the primary argument is that what is needed there for good government you are expected to find in the power of the General Government and its exercise. And in this matter, if the State is restricted and hampered by what is called the police power and the police duty of the State, not by its own institution, for that belongs to itself—not by the fault of its execution, its magistracy or its laws, but where it finds that the domain of its authority is curtailed in its legislation, curtailed in its courts, curtailed in its execution, curtailed in its duties for the protection of what belongs to it by its being surrounded by these other States, held by the trammels of the Constitution, are not freed from limitation and not free toward foreign nations, then I say that the presumption is that the General Government is to be appealed to under the presumption that it can meet the case. It is a difficulty that does not spring out of the execution of the peace powers and the domestic security, but it grows out of the inability of the State by its sovereignty (because it is one of a group which has surrendered the power) and the Federal Government is to be appealed to for its security and its universality.

As a matter of regulation towards our foreign trade, confessedly it is not only without the power of the States but it is within the power of the nation. As regards the communication between the States confessedly it is not within the power of the States but is within the power of the United States. This being so, it is useless, a mere fiction and a mockery, if each State inside itself is to be permitted to undertake to regulate the matter by the means I have stated.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a bill only last Saturday reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to our pork that is to be reinstated if possible as one of the commanding interests and commodities in foreign consumption, relieved from the injury that it has suffered by the repulsion of foreign nations; and what is its first clause and what is the principle, and pnrpose, and rationale, and method of the bill?

> That the Secretary of the Treasury may cause to be made a careful inspection of all salted pork and bacon intended for exportation, with a view to ascertain and determine whether the same is wholesome and sound for human food, and may authorize the proper officer of the customs to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such pork and bacon is found; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board salted pork or bacon found, on such inspection, to be unwholesome for human food.

By the Constitution, the matter of packing and inspection, as matter of values, as matter of domestic export, is not for the States.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator pardon me again? Can not a law providing for the inspection of commodities that are to be exported be referred to the commercial clause of the Constitution? If commerce is defined to be the interchange of commodities between people and States, then the commodities that are to be exported are as much a subject of foreign commerce as the commodities that are imported; and it does seem to me, and I suggest it to the Senator, that the power to provide inspection for this article, as well as for other articles that are exported as well as imported, is within the plain and unmistakable power of the Federal Government. So far I should understand the position of the Senator.

Mr. EVARTS. We agree so far.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EVARTS. Perhaps if my learned friend had awaited the application I proposed to make of that case he would see not only that I understood his question but that I had not overlooked the very intelligent proposition that he had made in his remarks yesterday.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will understand me that I wish to learn his views of the Constitution.

Mr. EVARTS. I unfortunately can not take the position of a professor now. When the question comes up as to the intervention of the Federal Government eo nomine in the domestic health and peace of a State, it is a very serious matter; but the learned and honorable Senator understands perfectly well that what is admitted to be in a State for that degree and to that purpose is not communicated to the Federal Government but belongs to the State; but when you come to deal with this matter of pork exported or with this matter of oleomargarine to form part of the foreign trade, the regulation for that purpose is within the power of Congress.

I only cite this as a case where there was no concession of the right to tax; it had nothing to do with it; we merely had a right to look out for our commerce, and we had a right to look out for it in the large measure of that we wish to find for the good of the whole United States, a market for honest goods and the credit that belongs to honest goods. Then, as to oleomargarine, this Federal Government in the execution of its admitted power and duty as to foreign trade, must intervene not only because the article finds a market abroad, but because it darkens and confuses all the integrity of our exports of these products if this curious and this unrestrained and unregulated export takes place. So, too, when you come to it in the comparison between Illinois and Missouri and the neighboring States and the distant States, there you have an instance on every principle of the Constitution, an illustration of the right and the duty of Federal action.

Then two out of the three cases are surely within our comprehension on the principle of regulation and construction, and in the third we infer the authority under the commercial power in the regulation of our foreign trade. Then if we find it necessary, if we find it proper, if we find it expedient, if we find it judicious to take hold of the whole mass we can say that when it becomes a constituent of value and energy in our foreign commerce we will take it and regulate it, and require that there must be a stamp upon it for all the uses of the market or of sale, and with a setting forth that shall show its elements, and that our foreign trade shall not be abused and shall not be corrupted, and that the General Government shall not be deprived of the power to regulate the matter, and that moreover it shall not be left to a petty, a continual, an unending, and an undefinable controversy over the article sold as butter by the pound in the groceries and by the small dealers. We do what we think proper in regulating it and from the source, and if it be corrupted afterward it must be corrupted, not by our assent, not by our acquiescence, not by our inadvertence, not by our supineness or our misconception or misinterpretation of the great duties that have been confided to the General Government by the people of the United States.

These tax laws are constitutional. Whatever I might think as to whether for permanent stability a different rate of taxation or a different rate of license might be more beneficial to answer the purposes which justly are within the control of the Government or not, here we are. By the Constitution, the origin of taxation rests with the House of Representatives. They have sent us this bill, I believe I am allowed to say, by a large majority after a full discussion; and these are the tax rates that the immediate representatives of the people have made, and the time has come when there is proposed to the intelligence and integrity of these Senators this question: Will you pass now a law graduating the tax differently from the law passed by the House of Representatives? You are now to confront the question, whether this mischief, whether this injury, whether this stigma, whether this danger upon our trade abroad and at home shall be suffered to exist by reason of a difference of opinion between the two Houses as to the rate of taxation. I shall myself forego any judgment of my own as to how I would accommodate differences of opinion. I must choose now and here whether I will pass this bill as it is under the necessity of justice to the farmer, justice to the manufacturer of oleomargarine, justice to the consumers of both, justice to our trade before the people, justice to our commerce abroad, or whether I shall go into a struggle and a controversy as to rates. Often in the affairs of life, often in the affairs of legislation we must decide how we will deal with the situation as it is, and not fold our hands and wish and wish for a better time and a better way, not reflecting all the while that if action is not had dangers and disasters are brewing and growing and threatening.

And now, Mr. President, if any apology be needed for the time I have consumed, I can only say that I trust I have not exceeded a reasonable limit of my share of the debate. I think every Senator, in whatever walk of life he may have been placed, however he may be affected by some circumstance of the evidence regarding this product of oleomargarine, and whatever may be said about the farmers and the milkmen and all the industries and competitions of petty life that may have entered into this debate, will understand that there is no greater practical question known that, perhaps, touches more of heart as well as more of property than this question of the dairy—farmers that are to turn their backs upon their little farms as honest men and leave them for wider pastures and for different pursuits. If there is any home and root that is fastened in a family and in a neighborhood and in all that belongs to poetry and real life that can be diffused through a mass of men, it is in these little farmers that have been able by advancement of combination to reap, perhaps, a little benefit from the painful and toilsome process by which at the close of every season it was a doubtful question between penury and gain.

I then ask that we shall have at least no ridicule and no belittling of this topic; that if this great breadth of land, if this great mass of population, if these great neighborhoods of families and sober men that make up at the ballot-box the sturdy voters who see that no detriment shall come to the Republic, and in the time of war the mother sends the son and the young wife her husband and the aged father that they may bear the brunt of war and save the Republic, and have saved it in war—they are the people. There are others, and many of them, thank God, in other pursuits, but in this you find none that are more in number nor more worthy in their character.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, toward the close of the debate yesterday afternoon, exasperated by what appeared to me unjustifiable personal allusions intended to be offensive, I made some observations that upon reflection I am persuaded exceeded the limits of propriety in debate, and I avail myself of this first public occasion to express my regret.

Undoubtedly, Mr. President, every citizen of the United States holds his property of whatever description it may be, and however absolute its title may be, and not only his property but his life and his liberty, under the obligation and liability to so use it as not in any way to injure the equal rights of any other citizens, and to so employ it that it shall not be detrimental to the general welfare of the whole people; and I have no doubt of the power of Congress to enforce this limitation upon the enjoyment of property, and, what is more valuable, of life and of liberty, by such legislation and such regulation as are warranted and authorized by the Constitution.

This is what I understand by the police power of the nation, and I do not subscribe to the doctrine which asserts that Congress or the nation has parted with the police power, that there is no function anywhere except in the States to exercise police power, that the General Government has stripped itself and denuded itself so that in cases of great emergency or danger or peril, if the States are torpid and inactive, if they are criminally negligent, Congress must sit here without any capacity or power to interfere with whatever may be detrimental or injurious to the rights of the people or the safety of the nation. There is a police power in Congress as well as a police power in the States, and I repel and repudiate that narrow and restricted idea of the national authority which declares that there is not somewhere sleeping within the profound recesses of the Constitution a potential energy that can be invoked wherever there is a right to be enforced or a wrong to be redressed.

And therefore it has appeared to me from the outset and beginning that this whole subject was being treated inversely, that we were beginning at the apex and considering it downward, and that the fundamental question for us to consider was not whether there was power in Congress, even under the police authority, exercised through taxation or otherwise, to interfere with the production of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter, but whether oleomargarine was a product detrimental and injurious to the public health and the general welfare, for I do not assume that the most latitudinarian interpretation of the Constitution will claim that there is any power to prevent fraud simply as fraud. The Government of the United States does not deal with that subject in this connection in that way. The fundamental question in this topic is whether or not oleomargarine is a safe, healthful, nutritious food product, and if it be, oleomargarine has exactly the same right to ask for a tax on butter that butter has to ask for a tax on oleomargarine.

It is not a question whether or not there is cheating, whether or not there is imposition by one man upon another. It is the question whether or not this product is effecting a permanent injury upon the health and welfare of the country; and if it be not then this bill is not a bill to tax, it is a bill to spoliate and despoil. If it be a healthful product, then this bill is not for revenue, but it is for confiscation and destruction; and if it be a healthful food product, then if this bill passes, this Government from this time henceforward has no obstacle to its entrance upon a career of unrestrained depredation.

Why, Mr. President, glucose, a low grade of sugar, is manufactured from corn. It is not denied that it is healthful; it is not denied that it is a legitimate industry. If oleomargarine be healthful and we can destroy it because it interferes with some other industry, why can not the cane-sugar men demand that there shall be a penalty imposed upon the manufacture of glucose? A German chemist has recently discovered a substance known as saccharine from coal oil, as vile, I suppose, and offensive a substance as anything that can ever be introduced into oleomargarine, that is of such an intense sweetening power that a single teaspoonful will change a barrel of water into syrup. It is now produced at an expense of somewhere about ten or twelve dollars a pound. What shall be said of that? What shall be said of the discovery of this substance by chemical analysis and synthesis by which, if all that is reported is true, the whole sugar industry is to be uprooted and destroyed?

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to give a brief answer to his question?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Sell it as coal-oil sirup.

Mr. INGALLS. Sell it as coal-oil sirup! That is very true, and I shall come to that subject shortly. But if it is to be pursued by the imposition of burdens like those which are imposed in this bill upon oleomargarine we shall simply be called upon by the sugar-refiners and the cane-growers to declare that it is unsalutary and dangerous to the public health, and therefore must not be permitted to enter as a competitor with that product.

Mr. President, we were told the other day by one of the Senators from Maine in speaking about the delinquency of this administration and its incapacity to know when the country was insulted by a third rate colonial power that down on the coast of Maine a very important industry had been destroyed by the interposition of the Canadians; that the citizens of Maine were wont in their dories and skiffs and wherries to cross over the river that divides those two countries, and at Eastport to purchase small herring, which were put up in cotton-seed oil in tin boxes, properly labeled in the French language, and sold for sardines. The Senator from Maine spoke of that as one of the industries of Maine, a legitimate industry, that was being harassed and imperiled by this interference with the American shipping industries by the Canadian men-of-war.

Mr. President, while I should prefer the sardine in salad oil under the imprimatur of Phillipe & Carnaud, I do not know that it would appear that the herring of Maine, properly imbedded in cotton-seed oil and inclosed in a tin receptacle picturesquely labeled and decorated, is not healthy, salutary, and nutritious, although it may interfere with the sardine industry. I should question very much whether either under the police power of this Government or under the taxing power of this Government we have any right whatever to prevent the imposition.

I allude to this for the purpose of saying that so far as I know the bill that is now before us is an innovation. Macaulay describes a certain class of people as preferring to perish by precedent rather than be saved by innovation. This is where we are in danger of perishing by innovation, if I understand the principles involved in this bill, and while I know nothing whatever about oleomargarine—I never saw a pound of it or a particle of it to know it, and I would not eat it except upon compulsion, and I do not know that I would upon compulsion, though "reasons were as plenty as blackberries," and I want nobody else to eat it unless he desires to eat it—I must admit that having read with something of minuteness and attention and care the volume of testimony taken by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in relation to the manufacture and sale of imitation dairy products, if there is any confidence to be placed in human testimony, unless we are to assume that men of the very highest character, men of the loftiest attainments and science and scholarship, without temptation to crime, have conspired with one consent to lie, and put their names to the lie, with date and place, without motive or reason for it, that oleomargarine is a healthful, nutritious, and cheap product; and there is not in this volume from the beginning to the end, from its alpha to its omega, from its Genesis to its Revelations, one single particle of evidence, express or implied, positive or indirect, that by the consumption of oleomargarine was ever one single human being injured in his health; and this committee was "organized to convict" oleomargarine.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. He alludes to the committee. I suppose I may be allowed to state the fact that, after all the evidence was in, the Agricultural Committee, by a majority of two to one, voted that this was not a hurtful substance to the health of the country and was not unwholesome.

Mr. INGALLS. Then so convincing was this evidence that upon a committee—I perhaps should not say "organized to convict" oleomargarine; that is too strong; I should say that I believe that committee did not sit with any prejudice in favor of oleomargarine—and yet so convincing was the evidence from men of every kind and degree, public and private, that as the Senator from Mississippi, who was himself, I believe, a member of the committee, informs us, the committee, by a majority of two to one, declared that it was not a hurtful food product.

Now, Mr. President, where does the police power of the nation, where does the police power of the State come in? The junior Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] appealed with touching pathos for the protection of the dairy interests of this country. He drew a picturesque figure of the situation and dwelt upon the hardy virtues and the patriotic valor of the farming population. Mr. President, I do not yield to the Senator from New York in my devotion to their welfare. But upon what theory of the Constitution or of natural justice or of the law of precedent that ever has before been invoked am I called upon to say that this product, admitted by the evidence and confessed by the committee to be salutary, nutritious, cheap, desired by many, shall be burdened with proscription and pursued as it is by this bill with pains and penalties, with the obvious purpose not of collecting revenue, because that mask has been dropped, not for the purpose of preventing the poisoning of the people of the United States by an unwholsome food product, but to protect the dairy farmers of this country from the further deterioration of their stock in trade?

Mr. President, the best types of butter are not permanent; they are not persistent. Butter is a compound that has many delicate, transient, and fugitive elements liable to rapid chemical change when exposed to the heat and the atmosphere. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests that it often melts in the mouth. It is liable to decomposition; it is liable to sudden change; it rapidly becomes unfit for human consumption; and the evidence is here that this product does not in any sense whatever interfere or compete with the higher class of butter. Nobody claims that it does. It is not insisted that it does. Those who manufacture the higher grades of butter confess that they do not care anything whatever about this bill. Yet here is a product that is adapted for the consumption of those who go down to the sea in ships, who are engaged in long voyages, especially in the tropics, where butter can not be carried because it would soon become rancid and dilute into oil, adapted for the consumption of the loggers in their camps and the miners in the mountains, adapted for consumption by the laboring classes of the South where the dairy products are scarce, consumed by multitudes voluntarily and knowingly, as I shall show by this volume, and we are called upon, confessedly in the interest of one class of our people, to destroy this industry for their benefit, for I say it is destruction. Nobody denies that destruction is intended.

I wish I had time to read, as I would have if the session were not so late, from the statements which this volume contains upon the subject of the character of this product; but I have only time to refer briefly to a few. Upon page 47 of this volume is the statement of Professor Henry Morton, who describes himself as of the Stevens Institute of Technology, Hoboken, N. J., in which he describes the constituents of this product, the process of its manufacture, and declares that it is a wholesome and nutritious article of diet. To the same effect is the statement of Charles F. Chandler, of Columbia College, New York, who states that he has prepared reports which have been submitted to the board of health of New York city and to the State senate of New York, in various years from 1880 down to the present. This is followed by the reports of Mr. Chandler, president, and Emmons Clark, secretary, to the senate of New York in 1878, a report by Mr. Chandler to Hon. M. R. Wise, chairman of the committee on manufactures of the house of representatives; Professor George F. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Henry A. Mott, jr., analytical and consulting chemist, 117 Wall street, New York; Professor S. C. Caldwell, of Cornell University, New York; S. W. Johnson, of the Sheffield scientific school of Yale College, New Haven, Conn.; C. A. Goessman, professor of chemistry at Amherst College, Massachusetts; Professor Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology; Charles P. Williams, director and professor of the Missouri school of mines, State University, who writes from Philadelphia; W. O. Atwater, from Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn.; J. W. S. Arnold, professor in the medical department of the University of New York, and so on, from men of the very highest professional and personal attainments.

So I think it may be fairly assumed that the declaration of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that this product is deleterious to human health and is to be restrained upon that ground must be abandoned. There is not a shadow of evidence left upon which that report can stand.

Mr. Lawrence J. Callanan, of New York city, representing the retail grocers, appeared before the committee and declared, on page 163, that he appeared—

> Not to oppose the manufacture of oleo or imitation butter, for I think it can be made in such a way and of such materials as to make it a healthy substitute for butter.

He continues:

> Now, the retailers of New York, and, I think, of the country, do not want to prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine or butterine; they simply want the trade regulated in such a way that it must be sold for what it is.

Mr. W. S. Truesdell, vice-president of the Mississippi Valley Dairy and Creamery Association, says:

> We admit that oleomargarine is healthful, and if these gentlemen will confine themselves to the manufacture of oleomargarine alone there would be no question about the healthfulness of it.

Mr. George W. Slade, of Fall River, Mass., a wholesale grocer, says:

> The firm has been in existence a little over twenty years. We deal largely in cream butter and oleomargarine and butterine. We commenced the sale of butterine about twelve or thirteen years ago, when it was first introduced into New England. Our business in these goods, at first small, has gradually increased. Our city has a population of about 60,000, 17,000 of which are cotton-factory operatives, who, with their families, number 35,000 to 40,000 persons. These people consume oleomargarine almost exclusively. The goods are sold in 10-pound tubs, with the full knowledge on the part of the consumer of their character. These tubs are all marked and sold in accordance with the Massachusetts law, being stamped with the word "oleomargarine" or "butterine" upon the top and sides in one-half inch Gothic letters.
> One of our largest retail grocers constantly advertises these goods under their true name and in the daily papers, price $1.10 per 10-pound tub. I have never heard any complaint as to the character of the goods or of any sickness occasioned by their use.
> We should regard it as a calamity to the poor people if they were to be taxed upon an article which now costs them all they are able to pay for it.

So says Mr. William B. Clark, of Worcester, Mass., wholesale produce dealer:

> We make a specialty of handling oleomargarine and have done so for seven years. So far as I know, the Massachusetts law is generally complied with.
> I recently saw in the hands of a party engaged in collecting oleomargarine tubs from families for packing lard sixty-one empty 10-pound tubs, all of which had regular oleomargarine stencils upon them as required by statute. About three-quarters of our sales reach the consumers in the original marked packages, mostly 10-pound tubs.
> Consumers of these goods in Worcester and vicinity do not altogether belong to the poorer classes, though the larger number of them do. I am personally acquainted with several farmers in our neighborhood who sell their milk and do not make butter, who regularly purchase butterine to use upon their tables.
> Our firm is interested in several creameries in Vermont, and we have not seen that the sale of oleomargarine interferes with or lowers the price of fresh-made creamery butter.

Mr. J. Merrill Currier, of Lawrence, Mass., a retail dealer in groceries and provisions since 1850, says:

> Within the last five years we have dealt in oleomargarine. We commenced the sale of these goods because our customers demanded them, and because if we did not supply them we found that they would go to our competitors, so that we thus lost their trade for other goods. We have found the call for these goods to constantly increase, and that they give general satisfaction. We have less complaint from them than from our cream butter of prime quality. We account for this from its uniform character and quality. We have never heard that any person was made sick by it or that it was unhealthful. Many of our customers say they prefer it to creamery butter, which costs much more. Our customers for this article are principally laboring people with families, and I understand they use it for the purpose of saving money with which they are able to procure other necessities.
> If a person calls for butter he gets butter, and if he calls for oleomargarine he gets that. We desire and intend to continue our business in this way. We do not wish to be obliged to say that the price has gone up 5 or 10 cents per pound, or that we can not furnish it, because the Government has put such a tax upon it, while the corresponding article on the rich man's table is exempted from this burden, and all for the benefit of those who are better off than those upon whom the real burden would come. So far as I know, the feeling in the community in which I live is unanimous in the opinion that any tax would be unjust and bear heavily upon those who are the least able to sustain it.

Mr. HOAR. Who is that?

Mr. INGALLS. That is Mr. J. Merrill Currier, of the firm of J. M. Currier & Co., of Lawrence, Mass., who says that he has been in the retail business dealing in groceries and provisions since 1850. Mr. Simpson, one of the witnesses, who was called in this matter, who is himself a manufacturer of dairy butter, says:

> I believe that the population of the country has increased very much beyond the increase in the production of butter. I believe that fully ten million people would have been deprived of any butter, or substitute for butter, during the past winter, and I think roll butter would have been 50 cents a pound if it had not been for the oleo. I think that would have been the difference if it had not been for the manufacture of oleo. I think there is a demand for all the fine butter that can be made at a fair price.

There is much more testimony to the same effect. There was one witness who lived in Chicago whose testimony I had marked, but which has unfortunately escaped my attention so that I can not immediately turn to it, but he declared that of the product manufactured by Armour, kept only as butterine and oleomargarine at the grocery stores, thousands and thousands of pounds were sold every day to the operatives in the various factories and mills and establishments about Chicago, who preferred it to any other form in which that material can be presented.

If the object then of the promoters of this bill is simply to provide that the United States shall acquire jurisdiction over this product so that there shall be no interference with the genuine products of the dairy, and not a desire to burden this manufacture with unnecessary imposition, the tax that is imposed here is out of all proportion to the results which are desired to be attained. It is admitted that not less than 200,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine are now manufactured and sold yearly, which at a tax of 5 cents a pound would produce, aside from the licenses, not less than $10,000,000 per annum. I doubt very much whether the most stringent regulations which could be adopted under the excise system of the United States would cost $500,000, because we are informed that there are not more than thirty places where these goods are manufactured.

I therefore move to strike out, in line 3 of section 8, upon page 6 of the bill, the words "five cents" and to insert "one cent;" so as to read:

There shall be assessed and collected a tax of 1 cent per pound.

Aside from the license taxes of $600 upon manufacturers, and $480 upon wholesale dealers, and $48 upon retail dealers, that would bring what appears to me to be an ample sum to pay all the expenses which could possibly be incurred in placing this product under the supervision of the internal revenue officials of the United States Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). The Chair will inform the Senator from Kansas that there is an amendment already pending, and that his amendment is not in order at the present time.

Mr. FRYE. Before the Senator takes his seat I desire to call his attion to a few remarks which he made touching the statements made by a Maine Senator in regard to the sardines of Maine. I ask him to what Maine Senator he referred.

Mr. INGALLS. I referred to the Senator's colleague [Mr. HALE]. It occurred in a debate here a few days since, a public debate.

Mr. FRYE. As my colleague is now absent in the Committee on Appropriations of course he can make no reply in relation to that. I was not present at that debate, and I certainly myself would not like to be charged by my silence with saying what the Senator reports my colleague to have said.

Mr. INGALLS. It was a matter that occurred here in public debate. I do not recollect the bill which was before the Senate. I think there were many around me who heard the Senator from Maine speak about the fact that there were large quantities of small herrings packed by citizens of Maine in cotton-seed oil and sold as sardines; and he spoke of it in debate as one of the important industries of that State which was being imperiled by the depredations of the Canadian privateers upon our fishermen.

Mr. FRYE. It is an important industry, but whether or not the gentlemen who are engaged in the business admit that they put up sardines in cotton-seed oil, and in tin boxes, and in imitation of the French, and sell them under the French name as French sardines is another matter. I doubt very much indeed whether this statement is justified by anything which takes place in the State of Maine.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend a moment while the pending amendment is read.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As the amendment is only two or three lines long I hope the Senator from New York will allow it to be read, and as it honestly sets out the objects of the bill I have no doubt he will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, line 1, after the word "that," it is proposed to insert:

For the purpose of discouraging the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or imitation butter, and to increase the price of genuine butter.

So as to read:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of discouraging the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or imitation butter, and to increase the price of genuine butter, special taxes are imposed, as follows:

Mr. MILLER. As the time has nearly arrived when I gave notice that I should ask for a vote, I do not propose to continue the discussion now, but simply to reply to what I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] stated as having taken place in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The question as to the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of oleomargarine was never properly before that committee and was never properly considered by it, but the members of the committee in their consultations did express their opinions regarding it. However, those opinions were based upon the genuine article, upon the article manufactured under the process of Mége, a pure article, and it in no way had anything to do with the article as we find it in commerce. It was never properly before the committee, and any expression or statement here as to how the committee divided itself upon that question or any other question outside of the bill is, I think, outside of this debate and outside of this whole question.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from New York allow me to call his attention to what occurred on that subject?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. MILLER. I do not understand that it is parliamentary or proper to bring into this body the votes or the conversations or the consultations that take place in a committee. The Senator of course is at liberty to state anything that he sees fit.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to state, and I do not think it violates any parliamentary rule, that at the very initiation of our consideration of this bill a motion was made before the committee, upon which the committee voted by yeas and nays, and the result of that was an affirmation on the part of the committee that oleomargarine was not a noxious article of food.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will undoubtedly qualify that by saying that that referred to oleomargarine, and not to any compound of it, or any adulteration of it, or any mixture of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course it meant properly-made oleomargarine.

Mr. MILLER. I am prepared to show, and could show here if I would spend the time, that there is to-day probably not a pound of oleomargarine made in the United States of America. I have a letter from a man who introduced the Mége process in this country, who first manufactured it, and who followed it from the beginning to the end. He does not hesitate to say that all the compounds which are made to-day are not pure oleomargarine; that they are combinations of oleo oil, of lard, of cotton-seed oil, of sesame oil, and of various other fats; and that the genuine article is entirely unknown. So whatever may have been the opinion of the committee upon the genuine article, or whatever may be the opinion of the scientific gentlemen who have been quoted here upon that question, it has nothing whatever to do with the question of the wholesomeness of the article as we now find it before the public.

This book of testimony which has been read here to-day, and I shall not go into that again, for at great length and in great detail I read the opinions of scientific men whose standing is as high as that of any others who have been quoted here, who show that as to-day made it is not as wholesome as butter; that it does frequently contain the germs of disease; and that it is always liable to be the medium of conveying disease to the human system. I showed that the Academy of Medicine in Paris had so declared against it and had forbidden its use in the public hospitals of Paris.

But in order that I might know something about the article which is now being sold in nearly every grocery store in this country under the name of butter I sent to the assistant dairy commissioner of New York to have him send to the Microscopist of the Agricultural Department samples of as many different kinds of oleomargarine as he could find in the market, and he sent here some ten or twelve different samples. I had them examined by Doctor Taylor, whose ability as a microscopist will not be questioned I suppose by any one, who has been for several years making a very careful study of this thing, and who was the first scientific man in this country or elsewhere to make the discovery that by the use of the microscope he could detect every different kind of fat known, of every different animal and of every different vegetable. He has undoubtedly succeeded in carrying his experiments to such a point that to-day he can take any of these fats and tell in a very short time precisely what kind of fat has been used in the combination.

Let me call the attention of the body for a moment only to some of the samples which were taken in the market of New York only a few weeks ago and sent here for examination. Here is the statement of Dr. Taylor:

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1886.

Hon. WARNER MILLER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture:

DEAR SIR: Herewith I respectfully submit an analysis of the ten samples of oleomargarine, so called, received June 12, 1886, from B. F. Van Valkenburgh, assistant New York State dairy commissioner, 350 Washington street, New York city, N. Y.

Sample No. 1 is an oleomargarine. Viewed under the microscope as received this sample exhibits crystals of lard. On boiling it gives off fumes of a very disagreeable acid odor and also that of decomposing cheese (caseine), showing the presence of butter. It is unfit for human food, being in a highly decomposed state. The sample is marked L. Aarensburg, N. Y.

Here was something pretending to be oleomargarine, which instead of being made of oleo oil was only made of lard and had mixed with it enough of milk or of butter to leave in it what is known as the cheesy flavor given to butter:

Sample No. 2.—This specimen is full of fungi, mycelium, and the spores of the same. Dark bodies, foreign to pure butter or oleomargarine, are also observed. On boiling a very sour odor is given off, and also that of decomposing cheese (caseine), indicating the presence of butter, although no odor of butter was perceived. This sample was too much decayed to detect in it the crystals of beef fat. Has a slight taste of butter. Is unfit for human food, being in a state of fermentation. The sample is marked H. & D., June 12, 1886. Probably Richards & Muny's goods.

Sample No. 3.—This sample is an oleomargarine. Viewed under the microscope it exhibits crystals of lard. On boiling gives off a slight odor of butter; also a sour and cheesy odor. Is unfit for human food, being highly decomposed. This sample is marked P. H. Riper, N. Y.; made by him in New York; old goods.

I might go on and read the entire list of ten, but I see the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is in his seat, and he told us the other day that the details which I brought out were so sickening that he was compelled to leave the Chamber. I do not desire to drive him or any one else from the Chamber, and I will allow him to read this article for himself. The whole ten samples show the fraud that is being perpetrated in making oleomargarine.

Mr. President, it is a double fraud. Oleomargarine itself is a bogus imitation of butter. The article put upon the market to-day is a bogus imitation of oleomargarine, made out of all the compounds that can be gotten together, because they are cheap. I do not care to go further into the question either of its wholesomeness or of its cleanliness.

A good deal has been read here regarding the desirability of this food as a cheap product for men laboring in factories and ordinary laboring men. Thus far these efforts to supply the laboring man with a cheap food have resulted in trying to cheat him out of his money by charging him substantially the same price for the bogus article as he would have paid for the genuine article. I could read the testimony of Mr. Harris, from some point in Massachusetts, in which he said he was selling oleomargarine honestly for what it was worth, and that it was usually used for cooking purposes and not upon the table. I asked him what he charged for it. He replied 17 cents a pound. I asked him what he paid for it, and he said 10½ cents a pound. In the examination it came out that upon the finer quality of butter he charges a profit of 4 cents a pound. So in this case if he had been willing to content himself with the ordinary price of the retail dealer he would have furnished these goods to his customers for 14½ cents a pound. Instead of that he charged them the price of ordinary butter, 17 cents a pound, and he said he could not afford to do it for less, and still he thought it was a good food for poor laboring men in this country. I do not care to go into that. I am not asking the laboring men of this country to use any bogus article or any other because it is cheap. I think they can take care of that.

We have heard a good deal about the laboring men and about the Knights of Labor and the various organizations organized throughout the country as opposed to this bill. There have been some petitions coming in here pretending to come from that source, and they have been sent to the Senate in order that it might exert its proper influence. I have been furnished with an original letter from Mr. Powderly upon this question. I will ask that it be read at the desk in order that it may go into the RECORD, and let us see whether there is any organization among the laboring men against this measure.

SCRANTON, PA., June 16, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Neither the general assembly nor the general executive board of the Knights of Labor have ever indorsed or in any way meddled with the oleomargarine question, and all representations to the contrary are false. I have never heard (only through you) that our order was accused of interfering in this matter. We telegraphed from Cleveland when in special session that we had taken no action. It would seem that that would be sufficient.

Individual members of the Knights of Labor may have favored the oleomargarine bill or opposed it. If so, they have a right to their opinion. As an order, however, we have not touched the question at all.

I remain, very truly, yours,

T. V. POWDERLY.

JOHN LIVINGSTON, Esq.,
New York, N. Y.

Mr. MILLER. I submit that simply as an answer to some things which have been said here during this debate in regard to the position of laboring men on this question. I shall not repeat my argument on that question, but simply say that the laboring men of this country, and by that I mean those laboring in manufacturing establishments, producing manufactured articles for sale, know full well that they can not afford to buy the product of any labor for less than its real cost to the producer. They know full well that they can not afford to buy the products of the farm at such a price as will bring ruin to the farmer any more than the farmer and the farm laborer can afford to buy the manufactured article for less than it costs, for if they do it must eventually come out of the wages of the laborer. The laboring men of this country stand together upon questions of that kind, and they know their interests well enough to do it.

There is simply one other question to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a single moment. It was alluded to and fully brought out by my colleague in speaking of the influence of the dairy industry of this country upon our foreign commerce, that it furnished no inconsiderable portion of our exports and performed its fair share in producing to-day a balance of trade in our favor, and maintained, therefore, a healthy condition of our finances.

The bill which has been reported here by the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to the inspection of our hog products is simply intended to give such a guarantee of their purity that they will no longer be rejected by the governments of Europe, and in order that by that method we may find a wider market for those products. Up to the time that oleomargarine began to be made in this country a very considerable portion of our butter found a market in Europe; but within the last few years it has declined at least 50 per cent. in its amount. Why has this been? Not that less butter is being consumed in Europe, but because of this uncontrolled and unlimited fraud by which these imitation goods are put upon the market as though they were original and genuine, it has brought discredit upon all our product, and to-day we can scarcely find any foreign market for the best made American butter. I have no doubt if we had the power under our Constitution to enact the law of the Dominion of Canada, it would be greatly to the interest of the whole country that it should be done.

Canada has a very simple law upon this question. It is scarcely more than ten lines long. It forbids either the manufacture or importation of oleomargarine into the Dominion of Canada under heavy fines and penalties. What has been the result of that legislation in Canada? It has transferred one-half of our existing trade in the dairy products across the border into Canada. Her exports of butter, as the figures of the produce exchange show, have grown as ours have diminished, and to-day she alone is able to hold her hand and control in the markets of Europe, because the Canadian brand is a guarantee of honesty and genuineness, and no matter how good our butter may be to-day it finds either an uncertain market or no market at all in Europe.

I have here a letter from one of the leading produce dealers and exporters of New York city bearing directly upon that question. I send it to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, June 26, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I suppose you know the Canadian Government have passed a law to prohibit the manufacture, importation, or sale of any imitation or adulterated dairy products in the Dominion. By this act she secures a preference over us in the foreign markets on her dairy products. One of the partners of a foreign produce exporting house here, and who also have an agency in Montreal, has just told me that they had orders for Canadian butter at 75 shillings per hundredweight, but could not get orders for American at 65 shillings.

I remain, yours very respectfully,

JOHN S. MARTIN.

Hon. WARNER MILLER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

P. S.—Seventy-five shillings sterling means about 16 cents per pound here, and at this price large quantities of fine, pure, June-made creamery butter could be bought in our market now.

Mr. MILLER. There is the evidence that our best dairy butter to-day is so discredited in the markets of Europe that if sent there at all it sells at 20 cents less than the Canadian article, which of course is no better. Take this then in every consideration, and it seems to me we do find sufficient reason for the legislation asked by the bill.

Mr. President, I appeal to the friends of this measure to see to it that it shall not be amended in a single section, that not a single line or letter or figure of it shall be changed by this body.

Mr. BECK. Why?

Mr. MILLER. Any change at this stage of the session may be fatal to the bill. As I said the other day, the measure does not go into effect until ninety days after the passage of the act, which will be near the 1st of November. If the bill shall become a law and if it shall be found that there is any injustice in it, or that there are any mistakes made in the bill, Congress will be in session within thirty days and can rectify them. But I trust that the friends of this measure will see to it that it passes this body as it came from the other House.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. With the consent of the Senate I will withdraw the amendment which I offered to the bill a few moments ago, for the purpose of allowing the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas to be voted on directly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS. In line 3 of section 8, I move to strike out "five" and insert "two" before the word "cents;" so as to read:

That upon oleomargarine which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected a tax of 2 cents per pound, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof.

On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to amend the bill as he has stated, and demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is detained from the Senate by sickness, and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. On this bill and on the amendments I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. TELLER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am authorized to announce that the pair of my colleague [Mr. SABIN] is transferred to the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] from the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. The Senator from Florida would vote "yea," and my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. Then I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Stanford,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. In line 6 of section 1 I move to strike out the words "with or," before the word "without," where they occur the second time in the line; so as to read:

That for the purposes of this act the word "butter" shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and without additional coloring matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. MILLER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. McMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. I ought, perhaps, to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. The pair was originally between the Senator from Alabama and myself, with the privilege on my part to transfer it, which I have done. I make this announcement now, and will not repeat it hereafter. The Senate will understand that the pair continues to exist on all the votes on the bill.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,
Allison,	Dolph,	Kenna,	Plumb,

Bowen,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,
Fair,	McPherson,	Pike,	Van Wyck.
George,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Pugh,
Hearst,	Morgan,	Sabin,

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 6, line 15, before the word "sells," I move to insert the word "knowingly;" so as to read:

Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any oleomargarine in any other form than in new wooden or paper packages as above described, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for each offense not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

That is a penal clause imposing a penalty for the selling of a less amount than is to be required by law. It probably was an omission in any event, and as the bill has been amended I suppose there will be no objection to this amendment. It is the customary limitation upon the act whenever a criminal intent is to be charged.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps the Senator from Kansas does not agree with me, but I ask him whether it would not be well to strike out the minimum punishment? There may be technical violations of this law by very ignorant people, and if the court has the discretion to fix a maximum fine it ought not to fix so severe a minimum in some cases as seems to be fixed here for the very smallest offense. If the maximum is right I think the minimum could be dispensed with. I suggest this to the Senator from New York as well, because persons may buy these things, and you may prove some knowledge, and yet in a matter like this very many ignorant people deal in this article, and when you give the court a discretion to fix the punishment according to the offense it is very hard to make six months' imprisonment or a fine of $100 the very least it is authorized to impose.

Mr. INGALLS. I propose as soon as this amendment is acted on to add the necessary amendments in lines 21 and 23, so that the offense may have a maximum punishment, striking out the minimum.

Mr. MILLER. I can not accept any amendment to the bill. I trust the Senate will before the bill leaves it reverse its action upon the rate of taxation. It is impossible if the bill becomes a law that any person shall deal in this article in any other way than knowingly and willfully, and therefore no such words are necessary. At all events I should fail of doing my full duty in this matter if I consented to any amendment whatever, unless it is put in by an absolute vote of the Senate.

I move to lay the pending amendment on the table, and I give notice that I shall do that in every case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas be laid on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before that motion is put, I ask the Senator from New York whether he meant to say that every amendment shall be laid on the table on his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But I understood the Senator from New York to say that he would give notice that all amendments shall lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will please hear the Chair. The motion is to lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas on the table, and that motion admits of no debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I understood the notice of the Senator from New York to be that he would ask to dispose of all other amendments in that way. That is what he said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motions can be treated as they come up, but this motion admits of no debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. He said it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MILLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is detained from the Senate by sickness, as I have before announced, and is paired. He would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. PUGH (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Miller,	Sewell,
Cameron,	Hale,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Teller,
Dawes,	Logan,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	McMillan,	Platt,

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Vance,
Beck,	Coke,	Hoar,	Vest,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Conger,	Jones of Arkansas,	Walthall,
Butler,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Whitthorne,
Call,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Wilson of Md.
Camden,	Gray,	Ransom,

ABSENT—19.

Bowen,	Hearst,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,	Sherman,
George,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Stanford,
Gorman,	McPherson,	Pugh,	Van Wyck,
Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sabin,

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to insert the word "knowingly" in line 15 of section 6.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will allow this amendment to be made, and also allow another amendment to be made striking out the minimum punishment at the end of the section, which it seems to me, except in cases of crimes of great aggravation, like murder or burglary with violence to the person, ought never to be in criminal legislation. The Senate for the last few years has, I believe, invariably, when its attention has been called to the matter, stricken out the minimum legislation; that is, the compulsory imprisonment in all cases without regard to accident or extenuating circumstances, and so on.

If the bill is to be amended at all, it seems to me that the pending amendment and the amendment which I have indicated would help the bill rather than hurt it.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], with the law before him, informs me that the present internal-revenue law is precisely like this, only that the minimum punishment is greater than this. So that certainly is not in accordance with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, as I understood it.

Mr. HOAR. No; I said that for the last three or four years, whenever the attention of the Senate had been called to this matter of minimum punishment it had invariably adopted the policy of striking it out.

I wish to say that one of the great blots upon our legislation is the existence of the very provision to which the Senator from Vermont has called attention in the revenue laws. I had this case brought to my attention when I was a member of the other House.

An Irishman who was a man of standing and character among those who knew him, and whose wife I had known very well as a domestic in a family where I had lived, was convicted in Boston of violating the internal-revenue laws by selling some article; I have forgotten now what the article was, very likely liquor. He had applied to the collector of internal revenue in the district to know whether it was necessary for him to take both a wholesale and a retail license. The collector said that he was not himself certain under the circumstances, but he would apply to the Department for direction; that in the mean time the man might keep on. He took out the license which the collector required of him, and he was indicted for a violation of the other provision in the interval before the reply came back from Washington, and was convicted. The judge, Judge Sprague, said there was no power under the law which would prevent his sentencing that man to imprisonment. He happened to be in a condition of health in which imprisonment for six months or twelve months would have been his death, and it was with very great difficulty that the administration here were induced to interfere.

Mr. MILLER. So far as the amendment in line 15 inserting the word "knowingly" is concerned, it may as well be accepted now as to have another vote upon it, because the vote just taken indicates that it will carry, but I shall reserve the right of course when the bill is reported to the Senate to have a separate vote upon it, if I then think it wise to do so. Therefore, I suggest that the word "knowingly" be inserted by unanimous consent at present, in order to avoid another vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Without objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 6, line 21, after the word "not," I move to strike out the words "less than one hundred dollars nor;" and in line 22, after the word "not," to strike out the words "less than six months nor;" so as to read:

Shall be fined for each offense not more than $1,000, and be imprisoned not more than two years.

I do not know whether that can be properly offered as one amendment, but I suppose by unanimous consent it may be so treated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it will be so treated. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I voted to lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas inserting the word "knowingly" on the table, not on the ground that I should object to its insertion per se, but upon the ground that thinking the clause to be perfectly safe as it stood I did not wish to amend the bill at all. But as that is put in, we now come to the question of penalties, and to illustrate that as well as the penalties under the internal-revenue system I will just read a section that I open at random in the internal-revenue chapter and title in the Revised Statutes, which illustrates both the absence of "knowingly" as a phrase and the amount of penalty. It is section 3268:

Every person who destroys, breaks, injures, or tampers with any lock or seal which may be placed on any cistern-room or building by the duly authorized officers of the revenue, or opens said lock or seal, or the door to said cistern-room or building, or in any manner gains access to the contents therein, in the absence of the proper officer, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than one year nor more than three years.

There is an instance in which one would suppose on the theory of the argument of the proposer of this amendment of "knowingly" that it would be necessary and proper to put it in, because the lock being once put on does not show on the face of it that it is a Government lock put on that building by a proper Government officer duly authorized to do it. But the word is not in, and if anybody happened to be prosecuted under that section, and he showed that he did not know that that was a revenue-lock building, or a revenue lock, and he supposed it was perfectly right to go into the building for some purpose, and he broke the lock, he could not be convicted, because it would be implied that the essence of the offense after all was doing it with an intent to do wrong.

Therefore I voted to lay the amendment inserting the word "knowingly" on the table, while if this were a Senate bill I should not, of course, have the slightest objection to it, because it would mean the same thing in such a case whether in or out.

When you come to the penalty there is great force in what the Senator from Massachusetts says, and if the bill is to be amended at all I have no objection to striking out the minimums, although it is not different from but more mild than the present internal-revenue law about distilled spirits, &c.

Mr. MILLER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas on the table.

Mr. MILLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Dolph,	Logan,	Platt,
Blackburn,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron,	Frye,	Miller,	Spooner,
Conger,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Cullom,	Hale,	Palmer,	Teller,
Dawes,	Kenna,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—33.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Hearst,	Vance,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Hoar,	Vest,
Berry,	Eustis,	Ingalls,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Gibson,	Jones of Arkansas,	Walthall,
Butler,	Gray,	Maxey,	Whitthorne,
Call,	Hampton,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.
Camden,	Harris,	Pugh,
Chace,	Harrison,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Riddleberger,

ABSENT—15.

Bowen,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Fair,	McPherson,	Morrill,	Sherman,
George,	Manderson,	Pike,	Van Wyck.
Jones of Florida,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sabin,

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 4, line 4, after the word "not," I move to strike out the words "less than one thousand and not;" in line 9, after the word "not," to strike out the words "less than five hundred nor;" and in line 13, after the word "not," to strike out the words "less than fifty nor;" so as to make the section read:

That every person who carries on the business of a manufacturer of oleomargarine without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not more than $5,000; and every person who carries on the business of a wholesale dealer in oleomargarine without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not more than $2,000; and every person who carries on the business of a retail dealer in oleomargarine without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not more than $500 for each and every offense.

As I do not propose to make any debate, I suggest that the vote may as well be taken on the amendment as on a motion to lay on the table, the object of that motion being I suppose only to stop debate.

Mr. MILLER. If the vote can be taken without debate I have no objection. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the difference. Section 4 relates to the people who are carrying on the business of manufacturing. There can never any question arise as to what they do, whether they do it knowingly and willfully; and therefore the reason which may have actuated the Senate in changing the other section can not apply here, certainly not with the force that it did in the other case. This applies only to the manufacturers of oleomargarine and it fixes a minimum as well as a maximum. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that the principle does not apply to this particular section, but it is one where there ought to be a minimum punishment, although I am generally opposed to those punishments, because, as the Senator from New York says, the person who persists in carrying on a business which may be extremely profitable ought not to have the chance of getting off and retaining the profits of his business with a very small fine. It seems to me it is not unreasonable as this is a fine and not imprisonment.

Mr. INGALLS. Having no wish at all to retard final action on this bill, I withdraw the amendment; and in section 3, line 15 on page 2, after the word "pay," I move to strike out the word "forty-eight" and insert "twelve," fixing the license for retail dealers at $12 instead of $48.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 15, after the word "pay," it is proposed to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $12.

Mr. MILLER. I move to lay that amendment on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from New York has not complied with one of the rules of the Senate, which requires that a Senator shall rise from his seat and respectfully address the Chair. [Laughter.] That is the only chance I have or any other Senator here has to get in a word or a reason why he is for or against this bill. The Senator from New York has spoken three hours or more on this bill, and has scarcely left his seat to-day. Now, the rule which requires that he shall rise from his seat also requires that the Chair shall recognize him, and him only, who thus rises and respectfully addresses the Chair. I submit that point. Otherwise there are no rights here, and we yield to these people called "managers of bills."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask if the Chair will recognize my point of order. I want the Senate, if necessary, to pass upon the question as to whether a Senator here can hold the floor from time into eternity, and even not measure space or eternity.

I have some reasons for opposing this bill, with which, possibly, the Senator from New York is not very well acquainted. I know from my association with him here that he is coequal with infinity itself, omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, but there may be some reasons which I might be permitted to assign why I do not go for this bill.

I ask now whether the Chair is going to recognize two or three men on this floor all the time. I want to give my own reasons if the Chair insists that the Senator from New York has the right to make that motion standing as he was upon his feet, and then I will appeal from the decision of the Chair if the Chair will allow that a motion not debatable in itself is debatable now on an appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that he rose and proceeded to speak without having the recognition of the Chair at the time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If I did that, I did not mean it, but I thought the Chair did not hear me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not recognize the Senator from Virginia at all.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I noticed that the Chair did not. That was a most evident thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not vote on the amendment directly? There is to be no debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to make a further inquiry, why it is necessary for the Senator from New York to apply the gag law to this bill or to amendments to this bill. I can not understand it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While a motion to lay on the table is pending we had better not have any debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand what is pending as well as the Senator from Vermont. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and I do not propose for one to be corrected by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the Senator to order. He is addressing himself to this question while a motion to lay on the table is pending.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not addressing myself to the subject of laying on the table at all. I rose for the purpose of making an inquiry of the Chair. It is done here every day of the year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the parliamentary inquiry the Senator desires to make?

Mr. BUTLER. I wanted to know if the Senator from New York proposed to apply the gag law to amendments to this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a question which it is not for the Chair to answer.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator from New York can answer it, or perhaps the Senator from Vermont will answer it for him, as he seems to be taking charge of the bill and of the Senator from New York and of everybody else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MILLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] asked me to pair with him at one time on the passage of the bill, but I did not understand that the pair extended to these amendments. I am advised that he so understood it, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. GEORGE. I was paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE], but that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] for this vote, and I therefore vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Hale,	Miller,	Teller,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Wilson of Iowa.

Dolph,	Logan,	Sawyer,

NAYS—28.

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Hampton,	Riddleberger,

Bowen,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,	Sabin,
Chace,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,	Saulsbury,
Fair,	McPherson,	Pike,	Stanford,
Gorman,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Plumb,	Van Wyck.
Harrison,	Morgan,	Pugh,

So the amendment was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish to announce in regard to the last vote, as I have announced before, that I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] on the passage of the bill. He is opposed to the bill and I am in favor of it. I withheld my vote on the amendment because I did not know how he would vote on it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH]. My colleague would vote "yea" if he were here.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK.

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further insisting on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands; the laws allowing entries for timber culture; the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, and asking a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to submit a conference report on the part of the Senate conferees on the bill just announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

J. N. DOLPH,
P. B. PLUMB,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

T. R. COBB,
W. J. STONE,
L. E. PAYSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments and agree to the further conference requested by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DOLPH, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5878) to amend the act entitled "An act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 118) relative to certain papers in the State Department by error, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Rules, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BUTTER AND OLEOMARGARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in line 3 of section 11, page 8, I move to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "ten."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 11, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "fifty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That every person who knowingly purchases or receives for sale any oleomargarine which has not been branded or stamped according to law, shall be liable to a penalty of $10 for each such offense.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does the Senator desire to speak?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, this is the only opportunity I believe that has been afforded to express an opinion of this bill other than such as has proceeded from its friends or its opponents based on the dairy system or the right to manufacture anything, and I desire to express my hostility to the bill, coming as I do from a farming community, because it is to all intents and purposes an internal-revenue tax. I do not believe that there is a farmer in the western, northwestern, or southwestern part of Virginia who does not despise the suggestion of internal revenue. I know that when I cross the James River and get into the tobacco country where we have people upon whose product so much per pound, 8 cents, for instance, is levied, they hate the idea and they reprobate the internal revenue. It begins wrong.

I do not love oleomargarine. I do not eat it knowingly, and will not have it if I can help it. It is a fraud. I would not take it under a law enacted here. If it be such a fraud as the Senator from New York says it is, I would not have anything to do with it; I would not license it. I would not say with the Senator from Kansas that you should pay the Government a cent a pound for it, any more than I would license any other fraud. But when it comes to the question of whether we ought to permit its manufacture and sale in this country, then I am with the farming community and say I would prohibit it entirely. I desire that to be understood.

I desire it to be understood, moreover, that in opposing this bill I think that I am opposing the most obnoxious law that to-day stands upon the statute-books of the United States, that which says that tobacco shall be taxed, that liquor shall be licensed, and the manufacturer of oleomargarine shall have the right to sell it if he shall pay the revenue tax on it. I am opposed to that, and I am opposed to this bill. I ask that the farmer who makes honest butter shall be put a little bit above the whisky distiller of the mountain counties. I ask that we shall proceed in this matter in some other way and say if this be poisonous food, if Chicago furnishes hogs that die of disease out of which there shall be made hog butter or butterine or oleomarganine that enters into the physical system and destroys the life of man, woman, or child, that we will not license it; we will not permit it. That is the simple way in which the question suggests itself to me.

Here we have been day after day trying to determine between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New York whether one makes good butter or the other buys cheap oleomargarine, whether the laboring man wants the oleomargarine or the laboring man does not. Perhaps the laboring man would prefer the oleomargarine in some sections, as we see resolutions coming here against its taxation. How easy it is to teach him that as he destroys the cow he abridges the number of the calves. He can not reduce the price of his butter as he increases the price of the cow. So we find these men coming up in their State organizations and telling us that they prefer honest butter because it is made by honest men.

I say give us no more internal-revenue taxes. Let us have this as it ought to come from the Congress of the United States. Deal with it as heroically as the surgeon would with the knife with a man on the field, where it must be promptly applied or the subject would die. We are treating this thing here childishly. It does not become us, it does not become the Congress. The country does not want such treatment.

If this be a fraud, do not let Congress license it. The States may do it; give them the opportunity of correcting it themselves; but for God's sake do not let the Congress of the United States set the example of licensing a fraud. Rather let the fraud go on. Let every fraud go on; let your gambling-houses go on; let every unlicensed institution that the country ought not to tolerate go on rather than the Congress of the United States even by indirection should pass a bill here recognizing the thing and say that it is licensed. Let oleomargarine be manufactured if need be, but do not let us tax it and license it; let butterine be manufactured if need be, the one from the carcass of the hog and the other from the steer, but let us leave it out of the legislation of the great American Congress.

I appeal to those of the Senate who recognize that when they do this thing, Democrats or Republicans, they are adding to the internal-revenue taxation the most distasteful to all sections of this country and to all the people of it. I am not afraid to stand right here and vote against every feature of this bill and every amendment that is added to it to help to pass it, and go home to a mountain constituency, a conscientious constituency, and tell them that I stood on the two principles, first, that we ought not to increase and give addition to the internal-revenue system by taxing these articles; and next, that if the manufacture of oleomargarine or butterine be a fraud we ought to deal with it heroically, and say that it shall not be manufactured or sold in this country, and that we ought not to be putting a tax on it.

It has been said that Legislatures have made laws that you could drive a four-horse coach through. Did you ever read a statute where it was said that a man who knowingly commits murder shall be punished so-and-so? Did you ever read a statute in which the word "knowingly" was affixed to the crime itself? I never did. The intent must be proved. That belongs to the books without being written, it is a part of the common law that we accept and never think of inserting here; but in the interest of the oleomargarine manufacture we must insert the word "knowingly!" You might as well try the devil before a court in his own dominions and expect a conviction of him as to expect a conviction of a manufacturer or seller of oleomargarine under the law which is made ostensibly to protect the dairymen, the farmer, the consumer of the product, if you insert the word "knowingly." What lawyer here would undertake to go before a court on a contingent fee to prove that a man knowingly sold oleomargarine?

You have had it under discussion here. Is there a Senator on this floor who can tell me whether he knows the distinction between oleomargarine, butterine, and butter? Is there one? Then take the Senators themselves who undertake to make this law, go into court, and you could not convict one of them even for eating it, much less selling it.

I took some little pains to try to find out and I was told that there was such a thing as cutting the one with a knife and the other with a fork, or one with a sharp instrument and the other with a dull instrument; but if you cut them both alike with the same instrument, the little water that we know belongs to butter would appear on the butter and it would not on the other. I have been told that if you take a lump of butter as it comes wrapped around with a linen rag and lay it on the table, and then by the side of it take a lump of butterine and lay it down in the same way, the butter would melt in one-third of the time that the butterine would. Does that help you to a conviction of the man who would sell outside of the law when you say that he shall do it knowingly? He does not wait for the sun to shine on it to determine whether it is butterine or anything else; he sells it before the sun gets at it.

I say that this bill is one that will do no earthly good; its only effect is to give the sanction of the American Congress to a fraud. Therefore I shall vote against it. That is my only reason, as I stated.

Now, Mr. President, if I have been a little anxious to make this statement I know it will be excused by Senators on the ground that I first mentioned that I have a constituency of butter makers and that I think I owe some explanation to them when I cast my vote against the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. MILLER. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 11, line 3, after the words "penalty of," it is proposed to strike out "fifty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That every person who knowingly purchases or receives for sale any oleomargarine which has not been branded or stamped according to law shall be liable to a penalty of $10 for each such offense.

Mr. MILLER. Let the yeas and nays be taken directly on the amendment without a motion to lay on the table if the Senator prefers. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Beck,	Coke,	Harris,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Walthall,
Brown,	Eustis,	Maxey,	Whitthorne,
Butler,	Gibson,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.

Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,
George,	Kenna,	Pike,	Stanford,
Harrison,	McPherson,	Pugh,	Van Wyck.
Hearst,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am in favor of the bill and will vote for its final passage, but I think there ought to be one or two amendments made, and the first one is in line 5 of section 3 on page 2. I see no occasion for the tax upon a wholesale dealer in oleomargarine being put at $480. I think that is exorbitant and I think it is unjust. I do not think that it ought to be over $120, and therefore I move to strike out "four hundred and eighty" and insert "one hundred and twenty."

Mr. MILLER. Does the Senator desire to discuss it?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. Then I want to make another amendment to the section, and that is that the retail dealer instead of paying $48 shall only pay $18. I think these two amendments very proper and just. They will make the bill, in my estimation, much fairer and more just than it is now.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will remember that in line 15 the Senate has already declined to change the sum from $48 to $12, which was the amendment offered.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate has declined to change it to $12, but not to $18.

Mr. MILLER. I shall not discuss it, but simply move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Missouri on the table.

Several SENATORS. Vote on it straight.

Mr. MILLER. I would as soon have the votes directly on the amendment as on laying the amendment on the table if the Senator will call for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 5, after the word "pay," it is proposed to strike out "four hundred and eighty" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and twenty;" so as to read:

Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $120.

Mr. MILLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called.) I announce my pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Aldrich,	Chace,	Hampton,	Vest,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Walthall,
Brown,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Whitthorne,
Butler,	Eustis,	Maxey,	Wilson of Md.

Cameron,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hale,	Miller,	Spooner,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Teller,
Dolph,	Kenna,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—18.

Bowen,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,	Sabin,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Saulsbury,
George,	McPherson,	Plumb,	Van Wyck.
Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Pugh,
Hearst,	Morgan,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. I think the Senator will not care for another vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the vote be taken by sound on the next amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 15, after the word "pay," it is proposed to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "eighteen;" so as to read:

Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $18.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to what I consider to be an omission in the bill.

I see from looking over the bill that there are certain duties required of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the collection of the tax, the preparation of stamps, and he is authorized to employ a chemist and other persons to carry out the provisions of the bill, but there is no appropriation. There is no authority given to him to employ any additional assistance in the way of clerks, nor is any money appropriated for the purpose of enabling the Commissioner to carry out the requirements of the bill. It seems to me that we ought not to require additional duties of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue without providing some means by which he can carry out the provisions of the bill.

As I have not said anything on this bill, I will avail myself of the opportunity to make one or two remarks on some of the features of the bill.

I concur fully with every one who desires to prevent any fraud being committed upon the people of the country in the use of any article of food, and I would adopt any measure which, in my judgment, was within the power of Congress to prevent the practice of fraud in placing oleomargarine upon the markets of the country; but without going into any discussion of the authority of Congress by the power of taxation to prevent the perpetration of frauds in the use of this article, without entering into that question, and conceding all that is claimed, for the sake of the argument, by the friends of this bill, I believe it will be wholly impotent for the purposes for which it is designed.

The cost of oleomargarine is about 8 or 9 cents per pound, according to the testimony taken before the committee. If you add 5 cents tax, it will still be below the price at which any ordinary butter sells for in the market. So this article could be sold and a profit made upon it without coming in competition with the butter of the country. I therefore do not think that it affords any protection to the dairy interest of the country. The tax imposed is too small to prevent the manufacture and sale of this article.

That being the case, the question arises, what necessity is there for this proposed law? Suppose you have the power of taxation, is there any necessity pressing upon the country to-day for taxation upon this subject? It can accomplish no good for the purposes for which it is designed of benefiting the dairymen of the country, and there is no necessity on the part of the Government for the increase of taxation in any shape with an overflowing Treasury and a measure pending before the Senate for the purpose of relieving the Treasury from the balances that are now in the Treasury not needed for the purposes of the Government.

If a bill was here simply requiring that every manufacturer of oleomargarine or butterine should so brand and mark the article before it left his factory that the community that was to use it should not be deceived, and that every man who undertook to sell it in the markets of the country should make known what he was selling, I am not sure but that I would go to that extent for the purpose of preventing the people of the country being inveigled into the use of an article under a deception. While it might be a question of very doubtful power as to whether the Congress of the United States could go to that extent, yet I am not sure but that for the purpose of getting clear of any fraud in that which enters into the consumption of mankind I might not even strain a point to protect the community against imposition in this regard. But when you add to that taxation merely for the purpose—for that is the design—of using the taxing power of the Government to protect one interest against other interests without accomplishing any beneficial effect to the interest sought to be protected, to that feature of the bill I am utterly opposed.

If I would vote for any tax it would be a tax to the extent that would accomplish the object which was proposed to be accomplished, but we ought not in my opinion to exercise unnecessarily the power of taxation for any purpose. It seems to me that we are departing far from the original ideas of the taxing power as conferred upon the Government. Whatever taxation is required for the maintenance and support of the Government is a legitimate object for which the taxing power may be exercised, but I do not concur in the views expressed this morning by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] that the taxing power has been conceded in the most ample manner by the States of this Union to the General Government. I believe that the objects for which it should be used are specifically defined in the Constitution, and that we ought to maintain the Constitution as it was made in letter and in spirit.

I did not rise to enter into any discussion of this bill. I am paired upon it and can not vote on it, but I wanted to have it understood and let it be known where I stand upon this as upon all other questions. I will not, however, detain the Senate with any further remarks.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MILLER. I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon what I think was the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in regard to the rate of taxation, and then see as to the rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 3, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the word "five" and inserted the word "two;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That upon oleomargarine which shall be manufactured and sold or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected a tax of 2 cents per pound, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof; and any fractional part of a pound in a package shall be taxed as a pound.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. I understood the Senator to say that he would ask a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that in my judgment this bill will be more effective and more likely to last and remain a permanent protection to the interest that it is designed to protect and a permanent obstruction to the fraud that it is designed to extirpate with the lower tax. I am in favor of the tax of 2 cents rather than 5, and although a friend of the bill I have entertained that opinion from the beginning. If the reduction to 2 cents, however, were to depend upon my vote, if the alternative were presented to me of having the bill go through without any amendment or run the risk of sending it back to the House, I would hesitate to take the responsibility; I think I would follow the committee; but I am very clear that if the amendment is to be adopted I shall vote for it according to my opinion.

Mr. HALE. I rise now, as I may have no other opportunity, to correct the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], whose attention I desire for a moment.

I have been informed that the Senator from Kansas, in the course of the debate upon this bill, alluded to some remarks which I had made in the Senate with reference to the sardine industry prosecuted in the State of Maine. I am told that he referred to those remarks as if I had stated that it was the practice of the people in the State of Maine engaged in catching small fish to put them up and label them with a foreign label, thereby making it a cheat and a fraud.

The Senator from Kansas was mistaken if he so stated. No such thing occurs in this trade, and of course I made no such statement with reference to it.

These small fish are caught in Canadian waters largely by Canadian fishermen; they are sold to the American manufacturer from the boats by the fishermen upon the other side, are bought upon this side of the line to Eastport and are there put up regularly and openly as an American product and not as a French or Italian product. In fact it would add nothing to them or their value, because I estimate, and others who have tried them both estimate the American sardine as a better article of food than the European article, and it is sold in the market as an American product and labeled as such, and I never heard it claimed or suggested that fraud was engaged in by putting any foreign mark upon the production or the box, for such is not the case.

I do not know that I have been correctly informed as to what the Senator from Kansas said. I was not here. My attention has been called to what he said, and I wish simply, without engaging in any controversy, to put this industry right, and that it shall not go upon the record as having been said or admitted here by not denying it that there is any fraud in this industry.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator from Maine to state that in a debate which occurred here some weeks ago——

Mr. HALE. June 3.

Mr. INGALLS. That the action of the Canadian authorities had interfered with an important industry at Eastport, which I understood him to say consisted in buying the small herring that were taken in Canadian waters and put up and sold as sardines. I may be mistaken, but if I am it was an error of my hearing. If the Senator has it here I should be glad if he would repeat his statement.

Mr. HALE. The statement is as follows:

Under the ruling of the Treasury Department, that these fresh fish brought into our market for immediate use or consumption are not subject to duty, they come in free and the New Brunswick fisherman gets the benefit of our market duty free. He sells his fish to our citizen who puts up the herring or sardines.

That is all. It is an article, as I said, well-known in the market as an American sardine, so put up, and it is not claimed that it is a foreign product.

Mr. INGALLS. Put up as sardines?

Mr. HALE. Sardines or herring. It is a great question whether the fish are not precisely the same. It is put up as an American product purely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] on the passage of the bill. As I do not know how he would vote on this amendment I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH]. My colleague would vote "nay" if present.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Vance,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Berry,	Eustis,	Manderson,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Walthall,

Bowen,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Sabin,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,
George,	McPherson,	Pike,	Van Wyck.
Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Pugh,

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the remaining amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, which will be put together unless a separate vote be demanded.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HARRIS, Mr. MILLER, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have been paired on some of the amendments to this bill with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]; but I understand in the present shape of the bill he would vote for its passage. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], who is absent ill. The Senator from Minnesota, if present, would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] on the passage of the bill. He is opposed to the bill, and I favor it.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Edmunds,	Mahone,	Sherman,

Butler,	Gray,	Pugh,	Walthall,
Call,	Hampton,	Ransom,	Whitthorne.
Coke,	Harris,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Md.

ABSENT—15.

Bowen,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sabin,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Frye,	Kenna,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.
George,	McPherson,	Pike,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MILLER, Mr. VAN WYCK, and Mr. GEORGE were appointed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call up for consideration House bill 9478.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 9478) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

OHIO SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the consideration of that bill be laid aside temporarily with a view of asking that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in relation to the election of Senator PAYNE, of Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the pending bill be laid aside informally with a view to proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Senator PAYNE, of Ohio. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Does that lay aside the bill?

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama is recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. Nobody can understand what is going on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again repeat the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HALE. What is that motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the pending bill be laid aside informally with a view to proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Senator PAYNE, of Ohio.

Mr. HALE. That requires unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. HARRIS. To lay it aside informally does, but to postpone it does not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is in order; it is for a majority of the Senate to decide.

Mr. HOAR. What is the effect of laying aside a measure informally?

Mr. HALE. That can not be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senate unanimously agree sometimes to have a matter considered as before the Senate and take up another matter informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that if a measure is postponed in that way it is the pleasure of the Senator having the bill in charge to call it up at any time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that requires unanimous consent. The motion in the book is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask unanimous consent of the Senate. Does the Senator from Alabama modify his request so as to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report referred to?

Mr. VOORHEES. Did not the Senate vote a while ago and was not the vote announced to postpone the consideration of the sundry civil bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that under a request of that kind the Senator from Iowa could at any time call up the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, if the effect of that motion be not to postpone the consideration of the appropriation bill until the matter proposed to be taken up is disposed of, the motion was wholly out of order, and certainly it could have no such effect as to give the right of way at the call of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that to be the effect of it. A mere request to lay aside a bill informally allows the Senator having that bill in charge at any time to call it up.

Mr. HARRIS. That requires unanimous consent; it is never done by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again submit the request of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LOGAN. As I understand it when the reports were made from the Committee on Privileges and Elections last week the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] gave notice that on this morning he would call up as a privileged question the resolution reported by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections pertaining to the seat of the Senator from Ohio. There was no objection made. It was agreed by the Senate that that should be done. If there is any question that ought to be at all times ready to be considered by a Senate or a House of Representatives it is that pertaining to the seat of a member against whom charges have been made such as are made in this and many other instances. I did not dream then that there was going to be opposition to taking this question up. I did not dream that there would be anything interposed that would in the slightest degree defer it for a moment. There have been quite a number of cases discussed here, but I have never before known opposition made in the Senate to the taking up of a case that pertained to the seat of a Senator—never before.

I stated yesterday that I was going away and that I was very desirous to have this case disposed of before I left. I am desirous that it shall be disposed of for many reasons. In the first place, I believe that the majority report of the committee is correct. In the next place, any man charged with an offense in obtaining his seat in the Senate has the right to be heard. Further, the three Republicans who had the temerity, if I may use such a term, to make a report here saying there was no evidence of a legal character to justify an investigation, have a right to show before this country that they have reported the facts and that they have been guided by the rules of the Senate and precedent after precedent that has been settled.

Now, sir, I do not believe in this attempt to postpone this case, so that men who have been charged before this country for the reason that they made a report which they believed to be just shall be prevented at this late day of the session expressing themselves and have no opportunity of being heard before the Senate and before the country. I demand that we shall be heard. I do not make that demand in any spirit except that which is guided and governed by the rules of the Senate in cases of a similar character; but just at the time when a Senator has notified the Senate that he is under obligation to leave the Senate Chamber within, perhaps, forty-eight hours this attempt is made to prevent this case from coming before the Senate.

Sir, I am ready to meet this charge that has been made against Senators here on legal grounds and on the grounds of the evidence that has been furnished to the Senate, and I challenge gentlemen to the controversy, and we will see whether or not we have maintained ourselves under the law and the rules of the Senate and the evidence that has been produced. I ask the gentlemen who desire a postponement—for what reason I do not know—to let this case come before the Senate and before the country, and let us see who has been guided by the law and by the evidence; or if anybody has been guided by any other motive than that which is to do justice in the premises, let it demonstrate itself. Now, sir, I ask that this case shall not be postponed, but that it may be discussed and decided by the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I was informed that it was the wish of the Senator from Iowa who has charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill to get it before the Senate, and that he would yield to me to make a motion to lay aside the bill temporarily and take up the reports that I have mentioned. I am very much surprised that there is any opposition to having these reports placed before the Senate for consideration, and that they should be the order of business.

Mr. HOAR. Why should not the Payne case be now here in its own right in regular order, so as not to stand with any single Senator in this whole body having a right to come down upon it and thrust it out? It seems to me that the true way is to move to proceed with this highly privileged question.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I moved to take up the sundry civil bill with the understanding and expectation that it would be informally laid aside for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who I understand desired to go away to-morrow morning, to address the Senate. That was my understanding. Now it seems that it is the desire of the Senator from Illinois and other Senators that this case shall be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; that is my desire.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I do not object to that if it can be disposed of in any reasonable time.

Mr. HOAR. Disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not mean to dispose of it to-night; I mean to take it up.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood that the Senator did not desire to go on this evening, and I supposed we could make considerable progress with the appropriation bill to-night, and that to-morrow a motion would be made to informally lay it aside. I am perfectly willing that the election case should be disposed of, but Senators will readily see that if this case be interposed and occupy any very considerable length of time it will greatly inconvenience Senators in reference to the appropriation bills. That is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. PUGH. I have a reasonable expectation that it will be disposed of to-morrow and not take longer than that.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question? Is it his intention to proceed with the matter that he has now called up to-night?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. If so, I see no objection to going on with it.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope we shall have an understanding that this matter will be concluded to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that there are nine members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I have been informed as to six of those members that they desire to speak on this question, counting myself as one of the six. I have been informed that one other member of the Senate desires to speak, and it is desirable to have the reports read. It seems to me, therefore, that probably it would occupy, in addition to reading the reports if we can do that to-night, all of to-morrow. I have no choice whether the reports are read to-night, but I suppose it would be more convenient to the Senator from Illinois to have that done to-night, so that he may have the way clear to-morrow if he wishes to get away to-morrow night.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I do not want to put it on the ground of the Senator from Illinois. I want it put on the ground of the right of the case, because the Senator from Illinois is going to remain here if this case is taken up until it is disposed of unless——

Mr. HOAR. I was speaking only of the question of reading the reports.

Mr. LOGAN. I will correct that. I said until it is disposed of. I mean by that if it is disposed of in any reasonable time. I expect to leave here to-morrow, but I shall not do so, and shall postpone going until the next day. We can certainly get through with it to-morrow if it is taken up.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me if we read these reports to-night——

Mr. COCKRELL and others. That is right.

Mr. HOAR. And then we can go on.

Mr. CULLOM. The reports are on our table. Why take up the time of the Senate in reading the reports in full?

Mr. PUGH. We can have the three reports read this evening, and I suppose that would take us to the hour at which we usually adjourn, and the debate can take place to-morrow. So far as I am concerned I do not believe it will take longer than to-morrow to reach a final vote.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to inquire what the Senator means by reports. Does he mean all the testimony and everything of that kind?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; only the three reports signed by members of the committee. We can not take up time to read the exhibits.

Mr. HALE. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator, that he ask unanimous consent, or I will, that the reports be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow and dispense with the reading of them. If we start in now with an agreement that the reports shall be read and nothing else done to-night there will be a general emptying of the Senate. Nobody will stay here to hear the reports read, the time will be consumed, nobody will get any benefit from it; and it is much better if there is anything to be said upon the case as it is going on, and there are before the Senate nine speeches, to begin to-night. Otherwise the Senate may just as well know and realize that with this matter started out and launched on the sea of general debate the whole of this week will be taken up by this case. Therefore let the reports go into the RECORD and let the discussion begin to-night. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. PUGH. I have no authority to make any such arrangement.

Mr. HALE. I will ask unanimous consent.

Mr. VOORHEES. To what extent did the Senator from Maine intend that discussion should proceed to-night?

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent, first, that the reports presented by the different members of the committee, three in all, be printed, without the testimony, in the RECORD of to-morrow morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. To that I think there will be no objection.

Mr. HALE. I presume there will not be any.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now as to the next proposition for the debate to-night, what was that?

Mr. HALE. That the Senator from Alabama, who has charge of the matter, must take care of it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought the Senator had made a proposition about to-night.

Mr. HALE. Let this proposition be settled first, so that we get the reports out of the way.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

Mr. HALE. That will save an hour.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see why the reports need be read in full. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Maine is a wise one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the three reports made by members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in this matter be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that the reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And that the reading be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. Now I wish to make a request for another unanimous consent in connection with that. I made to the committee a report upon a document referred to the Senate by the Ohio house of representatives, which was in writing. That report is referred to by the Senator from Alabama, and he supposed it would be printed with the minority report; I supposed that it would be printed with my remarks when I came to make them in the Senate; but it will be more convenient undoubtedly to all the members who have not got a copy of this in their possession to have it printed. I ask leave that this paper may be appended to my report—may follow it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the printing in the RECORD?

Mr. HOAR. In the RECORD.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. Let this be settled first.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will please repeat his request.

Mr. HOAR. I request that the document which I hold in my hand, which is a report made by me to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the testimony furnished by the Ohio Legislature, may be appended to the minority report signed by myself and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], may follow that in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Massachusetts that the paper referred to by him may be added as part of his minority report?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is nothing but the report made to the committee?

Mr. HOAR. The report I read to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, when consent is given that the reports be printed in the RECORD, I want it understood by the persons who print the RECORD what "the reports" are, what is meant by "the reports." I presume it does not mean that all the matter that has been thown in there which does not belong to a report at all, unsigned, is to be printed, but merely the reports signed by the different Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood it to be only that part of this document which is signed by respective members of the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I wanted understood.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that a document referred to, though not signed, which is made an appendix and part of the report, should be printed with it. It is part of the case.

Mr. TELLER. It is on the table of every Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. The objection to that is that it is composed of speeches made before the committee, and I do not know that the Government necessarily is required to pay for the printing of speeches of gentlemen made before the committee to go into the RECORD and put in as part of this report, when it is no part of the report at all, and is merely thrown in as a kind of makeweight. The reason I asked the question was that the reports should be printed and not the mass of matter that is thrown in at the tail end, having no connection with the report whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not construe the order except in the way he has done.

Mr. EVARTS. I understood the original motion and the agreement was that the three reports down to the signatures, with the signatures, should be printed and nothing more. Now the chairman has asked that a certain memorandum, which is referred to in the report of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], may be appended as a part of his. To that I think there is no objection. That, I believe, is all. I think that is understood.

Mr. HOAR. There has been no such qualifications as that referred to by the Senator from New York.

Mr. EVARTS. I so understood it to be made at the time.

Mr. HOAR. I do not deny that the Senator so understood it. I only say that it was not so stated by the Chair, and no such qualification has been made anywhere in any unanimous consent that I have heard.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to call his attention to the fact that either the Senator from Alabama asked the Senator from Maine, or the Senator from Maine asked the Senator from Alabama to what extent this proposition to print would go, and the answer was distinctly made, "the reports down to and including the names of the signers."

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear that. It may be so. Then the Senator from New York is right.

Mr. TELLER. There was a limit to the order of the Senate; and it was to print the reports and only the reports. The reports consist simply of what has been signed and not what somebody may have added. There is much stuff added here that never ought to have been added to any public document. It may be possible that the Senate wants to print a great lot of newspaper clippings. That could not have been the suggestion, even if it had not been confined to the documents signed. The order of the Senate itself is confined to those.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that when a report is submitted to the Senate with exhibits or appendices, with papers marked A or B, they are a part of the report, and that it is not customary to put the signature at the bottom of those papers. The signature is put at the bottom of the report proper in every election case, and in almost every report that is made to the Senate, in every case of a claim, the committee sign the report, and the documents which they refer to in the report come in and are printed as a part of it as a matter of course.

Now, if one reason among others for ordering an inquiry into a public question is the unanimous opinion of the press of a great State, I differ with the honorable Senator from Colorado in thinking that that should not be brought to the attention of the Senate. I think it is a very pregnant and important fact. That we will debate before we get through.

I wish to say, however, that it does not seem to me, as this has been printed in this document which is on every Senator's table, that it is a question of the smallest earthly consequence whether this addenda be or be not printed in the RECORD, and therefore if any single Senator states, as the Senator from New York has stated and as one Senator on the other side of the Chamber has, that they understood the unanimous consent to apply only to the part of the report which is signed, I hope it will go so and be so printed and understood without any further question.

Mr. HALE. That is the better way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood distinctly that the order applied to the reports signed by members.

Mr. PUGH. The paper submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts is referred to in the report signed by four members of the majority as having been copied in the minority report, and I desire the report made by the chairman to the committee to become a part of the minority report and to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate except the report of the committee.

The reports of the Committee on Privileges and Elections ordered to be printed in the RECORD are as follows:

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the resolutions of the senate and of the house of representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, asking an investigation into the charges affecting the election of Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE as a Senator from that State, report:

(1) On April 27, 1886, the Senate referred to your committee—

"The testimony taken before the select committee of the house of representatives of Ohio, and the report of said committee, as to charges against the official integrity and character of certain members of said house of representatives, in connection with the election of Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE as United States Senator."

(2) On May 20, 1886, the Senate also referred to your committee the following copy of the resolutions of the house of representatives of the State of Ohio in respect to the election of Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE as a Senator from that State, namely:

"Whereas it is the precedent in the United States Senate that charges of bribery must be directly made to warrant a committee of said body in proceeding to investigate the title of any United States Senator to his seat: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the house of representatives of Ohio, That in the investigation made under house resolution No. 28 ample testimony was adduced to warrant the belief that the charges heretofore made by the Democratic press of Ohio are true, to wit, that the seat of HENRY B. PAYNE in the United States Senate was purchased by the corrupt use of money; and

"Further resolved, That the honor of Ohio demands, and this house of representatives request, that the said title of HENRY B. PAYNE to a seat in the United States Senate be rigidly investigated by said Senate."

(3) The Senate also referred to your committee the following resolution of the senate of Ohio:

"Whereas by common report, suggested and corroborated by the public press of the State without respect to party, and by a recent investigation of the house of representatives, the title of HENRY B. PAYNE to a seat in the United States Senate is vitiated by corrupt practices and the corrupt use of money in procuring his election; and

"Whereas it is deemed expedient, in order to secure a thorough investigation of his said election as Senator by the United States Senate, that the belief of the General Assembly in this regard be formulated in a specific charge: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That in the opinion of the General Assembly, and it so charges, the election of HENRY B. PAYNE as Senator of the United States from Ohio in January, 1884, was procured and brought about by the corrupt use of money paid to or for the benefit of divers and sundry members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Ohio, and by other corrupt means and practices, a more particular statement of which can not now be given.

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States be, and the same is hereby, requested to make a full investigation into the facts of such election, so far as pertains to corrupt means used in that behalf."

(4) The Senate also referred to your committee the following resolutions of the Republican State central committee of Ohio:

REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE ROOMS,
Columbus, Ohio, May 5, 1886.

Whereas it has been shown to our satisfaction by the testimony taken by the committee of the Ohio house of representatives, under house resolution No. 28, and from other sources so strongly as to induce us to believe and charge that the election of HENRY B. PAYNE to the Senate of the United States was secured by bribery, fraud, and corruption; and

Whereas the testimony so taken has been by the house of representatives reported to the Senate of the United States for such action as that body may see fit to take on account thereof; and

Whereas the facts so established reflect upon the good name of the State of Ohio, and affect in morals, as well as in law, the validity of the title of Mr. PAYNE to his seat in the Senate: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Republican central committee of Ohio, That in the name of all honest people in the State of Ohio, and for the credit of the hitherto unsullied name and reputation of our State, the Senate of the United States be, and hereby is, respectfully requested to prosecute such investigation into the matters suggested by said report, and the charges herein preferred, and to take such action thereon as may be necessary to relieve our State from the disgrace which it now rests under, and to do equity and justice to all concerned; and

Resolved further, That the chairman of this committee is directed to forward an authenticated copy of this resolution to Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate.

We hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the preamble and resolution adopted by the Republican State central committee of Ohio, at a regular meeting held in the city of Columbus, Ohio, this 5th day of May, 1886.

JAS. E. LOWRY, Chairman.

JOSHUA K. BROWN, Secretary.

The testimony given before the select committee of the house of representatives of Ohio was taken under the authority of the following resolution adopted by the house January 13, 1886:

"Whereas the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette of January 12, 1886, contains a printed statement, on the authority of S. W. Donavin, alleging grave charges against the official integrity and characters of members of this house, namely, Hon. D. Baker, Hon. P. Hunt, Hon. W. A. Schultz, and Hon. Mr. Ziegler, so definite and precise in statement as to call for immediate action in order to vindicate the reputation of members of this house: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into all the facts of the charges so alleged, and report their conclusions to this house at as early a date as possible; and in the prosecution of this inquiry said select committee are empowered to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath."

The extent and character of the investigation made by the select committee, under the above house resolution, is described by the select committee in their report as follows:

"Although but four persons, and they members of the present house, are named in the resolution, and the committee is required by its terms to investigate and report concerning them only, it was found necessary to extend the inquiry beyond this limit, in order to gain something like a comprehensive view of the situation pertaining to said election."

* * * * * * *

"Whenever our attention was called to anything which indicated the probable employment of improper means to gain support, we followed the clews presented, on the theory that we were not only authorized, but in duty bound, to pursue any matter that promised, even remotely, to show the use of such means in connection with the election, because the discovery of one important fact, although having no immediate bearing upon the charge against the person named in the resolution, might lead to the discovery of facts having such bearing. And furthermore, and upon the same theory, our inquiries were not confined to the technical rules of legal proof, but the committee availed itself of any source of information—admitted hearsay statements, and even the opinions of witnesses. But we consider in making this report no facts should be stated which are not sustained by testimony upon which a legislative body might base further action."

* * * * * * *

The conclusion reached by the select committee after the examination of the fifty-five witnesses, is also stated in their report as follows:

"Although, as stated in the outset, the testimony developed nothing of an inculpating character concerning the members of this house named in the resolution of inquiry, we believe that circumstances surrounding the election of HENRY B. PAYNE, as one of the Senators to represent the State of Ohio in the Congress of the United States, as presented by the testimony, are such as to warrant us in recommending that an authenticated copy of the testimony and report be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate for the information of the body of which Senator PAYNE is a member, and for such action as it may deem advisable."

Upon the presentation of the above report the house of representatives of Ohio adopted the following resolution, on the 16th of April, 1886:

"Resolved by the house of representatives of the Sixty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the clerk of the house be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit a copy, duly authenticated, of the testimony taken by the select committee appointed in pursuance of house resolution No. 28, and of the report of said committee, to the President of the United States Senate, to be by him presented to that body."

The testimony taken by the select committee is contained in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 106. It is not denied that the investigation was had, and the testimony taken in secret session of the select committee with closed doors, and that the house of representatives refused to print the testimony. If any examination was made of the testimony by the members of the house, except those on the select committee, no expression of any opinion, conclusion, or judgment thereon was made by the house, by resolution or otherwise, and it was resolved by the house, in accordance with the recommendations of the select committee, to transmit the testimony to the Senate for its consideration and action without the formulation of any charge.

On May, 18, 1886, over a month after the adoption of the resolution directing the transmission of the testimony without any conclusions thereon, and requesting nothing but the consideration of the Senate and such action as it thought proper, the same house of representatives, composed of the same members, after reciting that—

"Whereas it is the precedent in the United States Senate that charges of bribery must be directly made to warrant a committee of said body in proceeding to investigate the title of any United States Senator to his seat:

"Resolved, That in the investigation made under house resolution No. 28 ample testimony was adduced to warrant the belief that the charges heretofore made by the Democratic press of Ohio, that the seat of HENRY B. PAYNE in the United States Senate was purchased by the corrupt use of money, are true."

The select committee who had confronted and examined the fifty-five witnesses failed to discover that the testimony was "ample" or strong enough to create the "belief" that any such charges were true; and all the committee could say, and all the house could concur in saying, on the testimony, when it was fresh in their recollection (if it had ever been read by any member), was, "we believe that circumstances surrounding the election of HENRY B. PAYNE as United States Senator, as presented by the testimony, are such as to warrant us in transmitting to the Senate an authenticated copy of the testimony, without recommendation, or the expression of any opinion or belief as to what the testimony established.

The charge made by the house for the first time on the 18th of May, 1886, nearly two years and a half after the election of Senator PAYNE, that his seat was purchased by the corrupt use of money, is founded expressly and solely on the testimony taken under house resolution No. 28.

The resolution of the senate of Ohio adopted on May 14, 1886, states:

"That in the opinion of the General Assembly, and it [the General Assembly] so charges, the election of HENRY B. PAYNE as Senator of the United States from Ohio, in January, 1884, was procured and brought about by the corrupt use of money paid to or for the benefit of divers and sundry members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Ohio, and by other corrupt means and practices, a more particular statement of which can not now be given."

The above resolution was not a "joint," but a "senate," resolution, although it undertakes to express the opinion of the General Assembly of Ohio four days prior to the passage by the house of its own resolution on the same subject. The resolution of the Ohio senate is based expressly and solely on "common report suggested and corroborated by the public press of the State without respect to party, and by a recent investigation of the house of representatives." It nowhere appears that the testimony taken by the select committee of the House was ever reported to the Senate, or otherwise subjected to its examination.

The Republican State central committee of Ohio, at a regular meeting held in the city of Columbus on the 5th day of May, 1886, preferred the charge "that the election of HENRY B. PAYNE to the Senate of the United States was secured by bribery, fraud, and corruption," and such charge is made on "the testimony taken by the committee of the Ohio house of representatives under house resolution No. 28, and from other sources."

Your committee are fully aware of the transcendent importance of throwing around the Senate of the United States the highest safeguards against seating or allowing any man to occupy a seat in that body whose title thereto was procured by bribery, fraud, or corruption. It is an undeniable public fact, causing general and serious apprehension among patriotic and thoughtful people, that in all representative governments founded on popular suffrage the indiscriminate and frequently the corrupt use of money by political parties, without exception, and their candidates, has become one of the most powerful and dangerous instrumentalities in elections. In the United States especially the power inseparable from great wealth in the hands of individuals and corporations has been, and we fear will always be, improperly and often corruptly exerted to produce successful results in elections. All parties invite, and as a rule demand, the contribution of money to control elections, and its influence has been found to be so potential that its use is generally accepted by public opinion as being indispensable and permissible to insure the success of parties and their candidates.

The charge in the case before us is made by the two houses of the General Assembly of Ohio, acting separately, and by the Republican State central committee of Ohio, that HENRY B. PAYNE obtained the seat he now occupies in the Senate of the United States by the corrupt use of money, or, to be more specific, by bribery of members of the Legislature. The gravity of the charge and the respectability and responsibility of those who make it are conceded, and your committee are deeply sensible of the obligation they are under to examine and decide the question referred to them as one of momentous public importance.

It is manifest that the charge as it comes to the Senate has its origin and support in the testimony taken by the Ohio house, under resolution No. 28, and forwarded to the Senate and printed in Miscellaneous Document No. 106.

It is equally manifest to a majority of your committee that no consideration of duty, law, justice, public policy, or propriety requires the Senate to authorize an examination into the title of a Senator to his seat upon the naked charge of the Legislature of his State that his election was procured by bribery of the members by whom he was elected, without informing the Senate of any fact or evidence or witness to establish or create reasonable ground to support the charge.

It would be unprecedented and inexplicable if any Legislature were to make such a grave charge without any preliminary examination into its truth or justification, and your committee feel constrained to believe that it is absolutely certain that no such charge will ever be made by any Legislature without an investigation and without evidence to verify the charge; and that it is equally certain that no Legislature would request the Senate to enter upon such examination without furnishing the facts and witnesses to create a reasonable belief that the charge could be established by legal evidence if the Senate were to order an investigation. The sitting member was seated on credentials under the seal of his State showing that he had been legally and regularly elected by the Legislature of his State. These credentials were read in the hearing of the Senate and remained on the files of the Senate sufficient time to allow those who now assail the validity of the election to make their charges and ask for an investigation by the Senate.

The main facts and circumstances to which so much importance has been attached to create belief and excite suspicion that money was corruptly used in the election, and that the Senate should make the investigation, were as public and well known when Senator PAYNE was seated as they are to-day. Why were two years and over allowed to pass without question or action by those who seem now to be so confident and persistent in charging foul play in the election of Senator PAYNE? The Legislature of Ohio exercised its constitutional power of electing HENRY B. PAYNE to the Senate of the United States. The Legislature that elected him had unquestioned jurisdiction of that subject, and when the evidence of that election in the manner prescribed by the law and the Constitution is presented in the credentials under the seal of the State every presumption in favor of the validity of the election must be indulged by the Senate.

But it may be, and has been, urged that the two houses, acting separately, of another Legislature of Ohio, send us resolutions, passed in due form, in which the specific charge is made that the members of the Legislature that elected Mr. PAYNE, or some of them, were bribed with money by his friends, and that his election was produced by the corrupt use of money. It must be conceded that the two houses of the Sixty-seventh General Assembly of Ohio had no power or authority over the election or the title of HENRY B. PAYNE as United States Senator. The two houses having no jurisdiction over the subject, it is manifest that as a matter of right or authority they had no more claim upon the consideration of the Senate as to the charge contained in their resolutions than the State Republican central committee. The only difference is in the number and position of the members of the several bodies who present the charge and request an investigation. The Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Ohio had power and jurisdiction to confer upon HENRY B. PAYNE his title as a United States Senator. The only power that exists anywhere to try the validity of that title and to annul it is vested in the Senate of the United States. Would the Senate order an investigation of the title of a Senator to his seat on a charge made by any body of men, whatever might be their dignity or respectability, wholly unsupported and unaccompanied by any fact, evidence, or reason to make out the charge or to create a reasonable belief that the charge can be established and the sitting member deprived of his seat by an investigation?

A majority of your committee are constrained to believe that if such naked, unsupported charges by one man or any number of men could involve the Senate and any Senator in a trial of his right to his seat, such a precedent and practice would become an agency of persecution by the political and personal enemies of any Senator, and seriously impair the independence and standing of the Senate. No expectation was entertained by those who make the charges in the present case that they would receive a moment's consideration if presented without being accompanied by the testimony upon which the charge is founded. Then the question is, has enough proof been adduced to justify the Senate in going into a trial of the right of Senator PAYNE to his seat?

In the case before your committee an investigation was ordered as to charges against four members of the Ohio house of representatives, and although the authority of the select committee was limited to the four inculpated members, yet the select committee enlarged the scope of its examination and explored the whole field of inquiry the Senate is now requested to enter for the discovery of evidence of which your committee has no information upon which they can act, as having any real existence or legality, to make out reasonable ground for belief that the charge can be sustained by authorizing another investigation.

Your committee are of the opinion that to deprive a sitting member of the Senate of his seat, the Senate must be satisfied by legal evidence that he was personally guilty of bribery, or that he was personally connected with the bribery or the corrupt use of money to procure his election, or that he had personal knowledge of such corrupt use of money and personally sanctioned or encouraged such use thereof to insure his election. The legal effect of such personal guilt of the sitting member on his election your committee do not decide, some members being of opinion that whether it extended to the corruption of the majority of the nominating caucus or the majority of the Legislature of the State which secured his election is immaterial on the trial of the validity of his title or on the question of his expulsion, as the single personal act of bribery or other corrupt use of money by the sitting member, as stated, to procure his election, would be sufficient in the opinion of some of us to invalidate the title he claims to have acquired, and would justify his expulsion from the Senate.

Your committee are also of the opinion that, if the evidence fails to show that the sitting member was guilty of the bribery of any member of the caucus or the Legislature, or had any personal knowledge or agency in the bribery, or the corrupt use of money to secure his election, then the Senate must be satisfied by legal evidence that a sufficient number of the members of the Legislature were bribed by the friends of the sitting member to secure the votes of enough members of the Legislature to insure his election, and that without the votes thus corruptly obtained the sitting member would not have been declared elected.

It is conceded that the Democrats had a majority in the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Ohio of thirty-six members, and that HENRY B. PAYNE was the only Democrat voted for by the members of the Legislature when he was elected to the Senate.

The charge was preferred against HENRY B. PAYNE by the senate and house acting separately in the Sixty-seventh Legislature of Ohio, which was a different Legislature from that which elected HENRY B. PAYNE, and was composed at the time the charges were made of a majority of Republicans in each house.

It is also conceded that prior to the day when the law required the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Ohio to vote for the election of a United States Senator a caucus of the Democratic members of the Legislature was held to nominate some person for whom the Democratic members were to vote in the General Assembly, and in such caucus HENRY B. PAYNE received 46 votes, Durbin Ward received 17, and George H. Pendleton received 15 votes; and that Mr. PAYNE having received over a majority of the 79 Democrats in the caucus, he was declared nominated. The charge is that money was corruptly used by being paid to or for the use of divers members of the caucus to secure their votes, in the caucus, for Mr. PAYNE's nomination.

When your committee met to consider the matter referred to them, the first act of the committee was to comply fully with the first request of the Ohio house, and that was to make an examination of all the testimony taken by the select committee of the Ohio house of representatives under its resolution No. 28, the report of that select committee being all that was then before your committee. After several days' examination of the testimony the chairman of your committee, at our next meeting, made his report as copied in the minority report, which is, in effect, after careful reading of the testimony contained in Mis. Doc. No. 106, no evidence, opinion, or statement whatever was found personally inculpating HENRY B. PAYNE in any way in any bribery or the corrupt use of money in his election to the Senate. Neither did such examination show that enough had been found in the testimony to justify the charge that the election of Mr. PAYNE was procured by the corrupt use of money, or that there was anything in the testimony taken under the Ohio house resolution No. 28 to justify your committee in reporting in favor of a further investigation by the Senate. On the contrary, it was agreed that the testimony was insufficient to support the charge and insufficient to justify the committee in reportiug to the Senate that the title of Senator PAYNE to his seat ought to be investigated. This action met the entire demand first made by the Ohio house of representatives.

About the time that your committee considered its labors terminated, the supplemental resolutions of the two houses of the Ohio Legislature and of the Republican State central committee made their appearance in the Senate and were referred to your committee, and soon after this last reference a request was made by Hon. Mr. LITTLE, an able and distinguished lawyer and Representative of Ohio in Congress, that he be permitted to appear in person before your committee in behalf of the State Republican central committee to make known to your committee by argument and evidence that the title of Senator PAYNE to his seat in the Senate ought to be investigated. Permission was granted and full time allowed for the hearing of Mr. LITTLE. Then came another request from Hon. Mr. BUTTERWORTH, another able and distinguished lawyer and Representative from Ohio in Congress, that he be permitted to appear before your committee for the same purpose, which was granted, and full time given for the hearing of Mr. BUTTERWORTH. These distinguished Representatives explored all the sources of information that promised any supply of fact, argument, or speculation, whether the evidence was legal or mere rumor, or hearsay, found in the report of the special committee or elsewhere, to convince your committee that another investigation of the right of Senator PAYNE to his seat should be authorized by the Senate.

The able and plausible arguments of Mr. LITTLE and Mr. BUTTERWORTH were founded confessedly and almost entirely upon the evidence taken by the select committee of the Ohio house of representatives, which had been pronounced by the select committee itself as wholly insufficient to establish in the least degree any charge that had been made against the four members of the Ohio house named by the correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, and which your committee had also decided was insufficient to support the charges preferred by the two houses of the Ohio Legislature on that testimony, notwithstanding the confident opinion expressed in their supplemental resolution that the testimony taken by their select committee was "ample" to establish the charge as to how Senator PAYNE's election was procured.

A majority of your committee report that the testimony taken by the select committee, under resolution No. 28, was not supplemented or strengthened by any additional legal evidence, and no new information, not contained in Miscellaneous Document No. 106, was brought to the attention of your committee that any court would not hold to be merely cumulative and speculative and of like character with that taken by the select committee of the Ohio house, and insufficient by itself, or in connection with the other testimony, and all treated as true, just as it might be shown to be if another investigation were ordered by the Senate, to justify your committee in reporting in favor of directing a trial by the Senate of the right of Mr. PAYNE to his seat.

Your committee having made a protracted and exhaustive examination of the matters referred to them, report.

First. That HENRY B. PAYNE has not been charged with having anything to do personally, or with having any personal knowledge of, connection with, or participation in any act, or anything that may have been done, or charged as having been done, that was wrong, criminal, immoral, or reprehensible in his election; that no member of your committee, and no witness, representative, or other person, has expressed the opinion or intimated any belief or suspicion that HENRY B. PAYNE is or was connected in the remotest degree, by act or knowledge, with anything that was or may have been wrong, or criminal, or immoral in his election.

Second. A majority of your committee report that on the whole case as presented to them they recommend that the Senate make no further investigation of the charge involving the right of HENRY B. PAYNE to his seat.

Your committee ask to be discharged from further consideration of the matters referred to them, and that the whole subject be indefinitely postponed.

VIEWS OF MR. TELLER, MR. EVARTS, AND MR. LOGAN.

Upon undisputed facts it appears that of the General Assembly of Ohio, as in session and constituted in January, 1884, each house contained a majority of members of the Democratic party; that at a joint caucus of that party held on Tuesday, January 8, upon the first ballot, votes were cast, for Mr. Booth, 1 vote; for Mr. Pendleton, 15 votes; for Mr. Ward, 17 votes; and for Mr. PAYNE, 46 votes; thus showing a majority in the caucus of 13 for Mr. PAYNE over the united vote of all the other candidates. In regular conduct of the election of Senator by the Legislature, Mr. PAYNE was elected, and his credentials were received by the Senate of the United States at the session of March, 1885, and Mr. PAYNE since then has held, and now holds, a seat as Senator from Ohio in this body. No action was taken by or before the Legislature which elected Mr. PAYNE calling in question the validity of his election or the conduct of the same in the canvass, the caucus, or the Legislature itself.

A new Legislature, as in session and constituted in January in the present year, showed a majority of the General Assembly of the Republican party, and on the 13th day of January the house of representatives adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette of January 12, 1886, contains a printed statement, on the authority of S. K. Donavin, alleging grave charges against the official integrity and characters of members of this house, namely, Hon. D. Baker, Hon. P. Hunt, Hon. W. A. Schultz, and Hon. Mr. Zeigler, so definite and precise in statement as to call for immediate action in order to vindicate the reputation of members of this House: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into all the facts of the charges so alleged, and report their conclusions to this House at as early a date as possible; and in the prosecution of this inquiry said select committee are empowered to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses under oath."

The select committee commenced the taking of testimony, under this inquiry, on the 20th January, and concluded the same on the 6th April last. Two reports were made to the house, one presented by a majority of 3, and the other by the minority of 2. On April 16 the House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the house of representatives of the Sixty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the clerk of the house be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit a copy, duly authenticated, of the testimony taken by the select committee appointed in pursuance of house resolution No. 28, and the report of said committee to the President of the United States Senate, to be by him presented to that body."

The President pro tempore of the Senate laid before the Senate the testimony and reports, and the same were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The majority report of the committee of the Ohio house presented as their "conclusion" the following statement:

"Although, as stated in the outset, the testimony developed nothing of an inculpating character concerning the members of this house named in the resolution of inquiry, we believe that circumstances surrounding the election of HENRY B. PAYNE as one of the Senators to represent the State of Ohio in the Congress of the United States, as presented by the testimony, are such as to warrant us in recommending that an authenticated copy of the testimony and report be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate for the information of the body of which Senator PAYNE is a member, and for such action as it may deem advisable."

The minority report presented as their conclusion the following statement:

"The minority of your committee therefore find, in conclusion, that there has been no testimony going to show that any unusual or improper methods were resorted to by any person with any member of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly to induce them to support, or that any member was unduly influenced to support, Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE for either his nomination or election to the United States Senate."

It appears that when the select committee of the Ohio house of representatives was entering upon the inquiry before them the following correspondence took place between Mr. PAYNE and Mr. Cowgill, the chairman of the select committee, and that Mr. PAYNE was never advised by the committee that "any testimony tending to inculpate him in any degree with any questionable transaction" had been received or any opportunity was afforded him of appearing before the committee:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1886.

SIR: As one branch of the General Assembly has appointed a special committee, of which you are the chairman, to investigate the conduct of the Democratic caucus which in January, 1884, nominated a candidate for United States Senator, and as the matter is thus raised to the plane of respectability, and placed in charge of intelligent and honorable gentlemen, I propose to give it appropriate attention. For myself, I invite and challenge the most thorough and rigid scrutiny. My private correspondence and books of account will be cheerfully submitted to your inspection if you desire it. I only insist, in case any testimony is given which in the slightest degree inculpates me, I may be afforded an opportunity of appearing before the committee.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. PAYNE.

Hon. THOMAS A. COWGILL,
Chairman, Columbus, Ohio.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, January 25, 1886.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 22d instant, wherein you note the fact that a special committee of the Ohio house of representatives has been appointed to investigate the conduct of the Democratic caucus which in January, 1884, nominated a candidate for United States Senator, and you also declare that you propose to give the investigation appropriate attention.

In reply, I have to say that the resolution to which you refer recites the fact that allegations of bribery, published on authority of S. K. Donavin, are of so grave and positive character as to call for immediate action in order to vindicate the reputation of members of the present General Assembly. It directs the special committee to "inquire into all the facts of the alleged bribery, and report their conclusions thereon to the house."

If in the prosecution of this inquiry any testimony tending to inculpate you in any degree with any questionable transaction be received, I assure you that your request to appear before the committee in such event will be most cordially and fully acceded to.

Very respectfully,

THOMAS A. COWGILL,
Chairman.

Hon. H. B. PAYNE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Instead of attempting a selection or summary of the testimony transmitted to the Senate by the Ohio house of representatives, for the illustration or support of our views and conclusions as to the proper disposition of the matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, we have thought it eminently just to accept as the basis of our observations the two careful and intelligent presentations of the testimony to the Ohio house of representatives by the majority and minority reports of the select committee.

Your committee were addressed by two honorable members of the House of Representatives from Ohio, Mr. LITTLE and Mr. BUTTERWORTH, in exposition and enforcement of the testimony, and of the just rules and principles which should govern your committee in their disposition of the matter before them. Subsequently, and while the committee was deliberating upon the case, as submitted to them, these honorable gentlemen placed before your committee certain suggestions in the nature of corroborative or cumulative evidence, which we append, with the majority and minority reports to which we have referred, to accompany our report. These supplementary suggestions we have justly given this prominence to, as indicating in nature, if not in substance, what might be shown in testimony if an investigation should be entered upon by the Senate.

The only constitutional rights, powers, and duties which can sustain, or properly induce, an investigation such as is presented for the consideration of the Senate by the honorable house of representatives of the State of Ohio, arise from two separate and independent clauses of the Constitution:

By the first clause of section 5 of Article I of the Constitution each House of Congress is made "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

By the second clause of the same section each House may, "with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

As these two ends alone limit the basis and object of any investigation proposed, either for invalidating the election of a Senator or expelling from the Senate a duly elected and qualified member of it, a scrutiny of the grounds, in fact, upon which such action is demanded, in any case arising, from the Senate, requires an ascertainment whether the scope of the proposition and the testimony, presented or reasonably assured, would justify the ultimate action of the Senate under one or the other of these clauses of the Constitution. We do not understand that the house of representatives of Ohio presents any case upon the testimony taken or imagined to be accessible to any investigation by the Senate, or upon any allegation of the existence of facts suspected, though not probable, as would affect Mr. PAYNE with such personal delinquency or turpitude as would invite or tolerate his expulsion from the Senate for his participation in the transaction which resulted in his election. The examination of the testimony suggests no support for such an imputation, and the course of the select committee in not giving Mr. PAYNE an opportunity to be heard before them precludes any intimation that such a notion was entertained for a moment by that committee or the Ohio house of representatives.

We do not understand that any member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections has harbored or expressed the idea that the testimony taken, or suggested as accessible or possible, touches the subject of this personal inculpation of Mr. PAYNE. We shall, therefore, confine our further discussion of the matter, as presented for the investigation or action of the Senate, to the question arising upon the validity of Mr. PAYNE's election and the declaration of his seat in the Senate vacant for such cause.

It is, no doubt, supposable that an election may be vitiated by fraud, corruption, and bribery without the member unseated being accused even of personal participation in the fraud, corruption, or bribery, by which his election was compassed. If the election is thus vitiated, the member's seat can not be saved by his personal exculpation and vindication. The integrity of the election, and not of the member, is in question under this clause of the Constitution.

But, on the same reason, the investigation, which now deals with the election as vitiated, and not the member as innocent, must reach the proof that the fraud, corruption, or bribery embraces enough in number of the voting electors to have changed, by these methods, the result of the election. If these corrupted votes gave the innocent member his seat, the deprivation of these corrupted votes vacates his seat, however innocent he is. But, if the uncorrupted votes were adequate to his election, and he is purged from complicity in the fraud, corruption, or bribery, his seat is not exposed to any question of validity in the election.

Upon a reference to the testimony presented by the Ohio house of representatives, and sifted and emphasized by the select committee's majority and minority reports, we are able to ascertain the number of members of the General Assembly of Ohio that have been brought into inculpation, the degree and weight of evidence affecting each of them, and the conclusions of these two committees as to what had been proved, or could be expected to be proved, as bearing upon each of these members.

As to four members, namely, Messrs. Baker, Hunt, Schultz, and Ziegler, being the members of the house of representatives of 1886 upon charges against whom the general investigations were set on foot, we find the committee, by the majority report, declare that "the testimony developed nothing of an inculpating character concerning the members of this house named in the resolution of inquiry." The minority report express their conclusions to the same effect, as follows:

"That there has been absolutely nothing found in any way compromising the four members charged, and they are wholly exonerated from the charges made, and stand to-day without the shadow of a suspicion attaching to them in regard to conduct unbecoming members of this house."

As to two members of the house, namely, Mr. Kahle and Mr. Hull, the majority report names them as "two instances in which attempted bribery in the Senatorial canvass was reported by members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly," and sets forth, as the report expresses it, "the testimony taken as to what those members reported" "in brief." Both Mr. Kahle and Mr. Hull were active and earnest supporters of Mr. Pendleton in the canvass, and so continued to the end, voting for Mr. Pendleton in the caucus and in the Legislature. The evidence respecting these two members, as given or commented upon by the majority and minority reports, we refer to, conformably to our declared purpose, without attempting any observations of our own upon the testimony. For the immediate consideration now presented, it is sufficient to say, that no diversion from Mr. Pendleton's support to Mr. PAYNE's was effected as to these two electors.

The select committee names in the majority report two senators and two representatives, and speaks of them as follows:

"Rumors as to suspected bribery with which were connected the names of Messrs. Mooney and Roche, members of the house, and Messrs. White and Ramey, members of the senate, of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly, all of whom voted in caucus for HENRY B. PAYNE for United States Senator, were traced by the committee until developments, which were regarded as important, were reached, as follows"—

Giving the testimony bearing upon each, as viewed by the majority of the committee. The minority report takes up the case of each of these members, and comments upon the evidence which it adduces from the testimony, and declares as to each of them that the testimony justifies no imputation upon any one of them. We again, without any observations of our own on the evidence, refer to the majority and minority reports on this topic.

It is proper that we should call the attention of the Senate to the very explicit and candid statement of the majority report, as to the reach and scope which were given to the investigation, and of the distinction drawn between the testimony at large and the report itself, as the latter containing "no facts" "which are not sustained by testimony upon which a legislative body might base further action." This report says:

"Whenever our attention was called to anything which indicated the probable employment of improper means to gain support, we followed the clews presented, on the theory that we were not only authorized but in duty bouud to pursue any matter that promised even remotely to show the use of such means in connection with the election, because the discovery of one important fact, although having no immediate bearing upon the charge against the persons named in the resolution, might lead to the discovery of facts having such bearing. And furthermore, and upon the same theory, our inquiries were not confined to the technical rules of legal proof, but the committee availed itself of any source of information—admitted hearsay statements, and even the opinion of witnesses. But we consider that in making this report no facts should be stated which are not sustained by testimony upon which a legislative body might base further action."

The minority report thus speaks of the completeness of the investigation instituted by the committee:

"Your committee, in its anxiety that nothing, however trivial and remote, that might have, either directly or indirectly, any possible bearing on the matter under consideration, have exercised the greatest liberality possible in the taking of testimony, which has extended the scope of its inquiry far beyond the limits that could be given the most liberal construction of the resolution."

As the result of this wide investigation it does not appear that the select committee recommended any action by the Legislature looking to a further investigation, or to the incrimination or punishment in the courts of law of any persons named in the report, nor that the Legislature itself has proposed any action in such directions or either of them. Indeed, the whole recommendation of the committee to the House of Representatives is in these words:

"That an authenticated copy of the testimony and report be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate for the information of the body of which Senator PAYNE is a member, and for such action as it may deem advisable."

In pursuance of this recommendation the house of representatives communicated to the Senate the testimony taken and the reports of the committee, which are before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The only action taken by either house of the General Assembly of Ohio since, that has been brought to the attention of the Senate or of its committee, is shown in a resolution of the senate of Ohio, and one of the house of representatives, as follows:

Senatorial election in Ohio.

[Senate resolution—Mr. Hardacre—No. 58.]

Whereas by common report, suggested and corroborated by the public press of the State without respect to party and by a recent investigation of the house of representatives, the title of HENRY B. PAYNE to a seat in the United States Senate is vitiated by corrupt practices and the corrupt use of money in procuring his election; and

Whereas it is deemed expedient, in order to secure a thorough investigation of his said election as Senator by the United States Senate, that the belief of the General Assembly in this regard be formulated in a specific charge: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in the opinion of the General Assembly, and it so charges, the election of HENRY B. PAYNE as Senator of the United States from Ohio, in January, 1884, was procured and brought about by the corrupt use of money, paid to or for the benefit of divers and sundry members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly of Ohio, and by other corrupt means and practices, a more particular statement of which can not now be given.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States be, and the same is hereby, requested to make a full investigation into the facts of such election so far as pertains to corrupt means used in that behalf.

Resolved, That the governor be, and is hereby, requested to forward a copy thereof to the President of the Senate of the United States.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of said resolution, as the same appears upon the senate journal of Friday, May 14, 1886, after being changed from a "joint" to a "senate" resolution, and adopted by the senate.

C. N. VALLANDIGHAM,
Clerk Ohio Senate.

[H. R. No. 89.—Mr. Brumback.]

Whereas it is the precedent in the United States Senate that charges of bribery must be directly made to warrant a committee of said body in proceeding to investigate the title of any United States Senator to his seat: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of Ohio, That in the investigation made under house resolution No. 28 ample testimony was adduced to warrant the belief that the charges heretofore made by the Democratic press of Ohio are true, to wit: That the seat of Henry B. Payne in the United States Senate was purchased by the corrupt use of money; and

Further resolved, That the honor of Ohio demands, and this house of representatives requests, that the said title of HENRY B. PAYNE to a seat in the United States Senate be rigidly investigated by said Senate; and Further resolved, That the governor of Ohio be requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States Senate.

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Adopted May 18, 1886.
Attest: DAVID LANNING, Clerk.

Upon the whole matter as presented, in evidence and argument, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, we are of opinion that there is no evidence which purports to prove that fraud, corruption, or bribery was employed in the election of Mr. PAYNE affecting the votes, given either in the caucus or in the Legislature, whereby the election was carried by corrupt votes to the effect of his election. Nor, in our opinion, is there any allegation that proof exists or would be forthcoming to the extent that would vitiate the election of Mr. PAYNE by reason of the necessary votes, in caucus or in the Legislature, for his election, having been obtained by fraud, corruption, or bribery.

We are of opinion, therefore, that under the first clause of the fifth section of Article I of the Constitution the testimony and other considerations placed before the Senate do not warrant the Senate in instituting by itself an investigation looking to the unseating of Mr. PAYNE as a member of the Senate.

We have, in our conclusions, made no distinction between the use of fraud, corruption, or bribery in a caucus vote or in the legislative vote for a Senator. Although a caucus, or what proceeds in it, has no constitutional or legal relation to the election of a Senator, yet, by the habit of political parties, the stage of determination as to who is to be elected Senator, and the influences, proper or improper, that produce that determination, is that which precedes and is concluded in the caucus. So far as the question of personal delinquency or turpitude is concerned, no moral distinction should be taken between corrupt proceedings in caucus and those in the Legislature. How far any such distinction would need to be insisted upon, in any case, on the question of unseating a Senator, where he himself was not affected with any personal misconduct or complicity with the misconduct of others, we have no occasion, in the immediate case or present attitude of the subject, to consider or suggest.

At the outset of our observations we stated the limits which properly should control the action of the Senate, under the applicable clauses of the Constitution, and by the same reason the ends which should be proposed in its investigations and to which they should be confined. It is obvious that the province and duty of a State, in its investigations of fraud, corruption, and bribery in an election of Senator, are much more extensive. A State is not confined at all to the question whether the actual election brought in question involves the Senator personally in misconduct, or whether enough votes for him were affected by fraud, corruption, or bribery that would require his seat to be vacated, although himself free from imputation.

The State should execute its laws respecting the purity of Senatorial elections, by the indictment and conviction of a single person who bribes or is bribed, whether the election is affected or not. The State should investigate as well to the end of better laws and surer execution of the laws. The State, too, is charged with the maintenance of "the honor of Ohio," and its vindication rests with its own legislation, its own judiciary, and its own people, but it can not demand this vindication at the hands of the United States Senate, except as that may flow from investigations by that body within the limits of its constitutional powers and duties.

That State has conducted and concluded its investigations into the election of Mr. PAYNE, and has placed the result before the Senate of the United States. It has attempted no further investigations either by the plenary power of its Legislature, or through the functions of the courts of law. If, upon further examinations made by the State, through its Legislature or its courts, a case should be presented for renewed consideration by the Senate, within the rules and principles we have stated as governing the action of the Senate, the further action of the Senate will be governed by what may then appear. As the whole matter now stands before the committee, we concur in its judgment that an investigation should not be instituted by the Senate, and the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and for the reasons which we have thus given.

H. M. TELLER.
WM. M. EVARTS.
JOHN A. LOGAN.

VIEWS OF MR. HOAR AND MR. FRYE.

The undersigned can not concur with the report of the majority.

The senate and house of representatives of the State of Ohio and the Republican State committee, representing the political party which for much the larger portion of the last thirty years has contained a majority of the voters of that State, have each addressed a memorial to the Senate charging that the election of the sitting member was procured by bribery and corruption and praying the Senate to cause an investigation into said charges. Two gentlemen of high character and position, Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH, both now members of the other House from the State of Ohio, the former lately attorney-general of that State, appeared before the committee, declared their personal belief in the truth of the charge, asserted that in their opinion the belief is entertained by a large majority of the people of Ohio of both political parties, and asked to be permitted to lay before the committee evidence to support it. Besides Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH eight of the Ohio delegation in the House add their earnest request to the same effect, affirm that the investigation is demanded by a large majority in number and influence of the press of the State, say that additional testimony is in the possession of Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH, and express their belief that "if opportunity is offered the charges of the Ohio senate will be sustained by testimony to your full satisfaction."

Before the memorials above referred to were presented, there had been presented to the Senate for its information the evidence taken by a committee of the house of representatives of Ohio, who were directed to investigate charges of corruption in said election against four members of the present house of representatives of Ohio, being the only members of the Legislature who made the election against whom allegations of bribery were made who have been continued in the public service, and the conclusions of the committee upon said evidence. Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH also produced certain affidavits and letters stating confessions of persons implicated, and pointing out other sources where evidence would probably be obtained if lawful authority should be given by the Senate to procure it.

We think this presents a case where it is the duty of the Senate to permit the petitioners to present their evidence and to authorize the issue of proper process to aid them in procuring the attendance of witnesses.

The Constitution declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members." The Senate is the only court which has, or under the Constitution possibly can have, jurisdiction of this question. There can be no trial, inquiry, or adjudication anywhere else to which this inquiry is not totally foreign and immaterial." The courts in Ohio may exercise jurisdiction of the offense of bribery of or by an individual. But the question whether the result of an election of Senator was thereby changed can never be before those courts. Either house of the Legislature may inquire as to the personal turpitude of its own members. But the action which may result from such investigation must be precisely the same, whether other persons also were or were not corrupted, and whether the choice of Senator were or were not affected.

As the Senate is the only court that can properly try this question, so the charge is made, if not in the only way it can be made, yet certainly in the way beyond all others in which it can be made with most authority. The Legislature of Ohio is the representative of the dignity, interest, and honor of the State. It appoints the Senators of the United States, and if a vacancy in the office exists it must fill it. It is supported in this charge by the committee who are, under our political customs, the organ of more than half the voters of the State concerned.

For the Senate to refuse to listen to this complaint so made would, it seems to us, be, and be everywhere taken to be, a declaration that it is indifferent to the question whether its seats are to be in the future the subject of bargain and sale, or may be presented by a few millionaires as a compliment to a friend. No more fatal blow can be struck at the Senate or at the purity and permanence of republican government itself than the establishment of this precedent.

But the case does not rest alone upon the charge and the character of the parties who make it, and who ask to be permitted to produce evidence in its support. If it did, it in our judgment would be enough. It is surely a strange answer to be given by a court to a suitor to say that it has already considered the question and decided the case before it is presented.

But the petitioners adduce strong reasons to show probable cause that they can establish their case. The testimony taken by the committee in Ohio has been referred to us. Our attention has also been called to evidence pointing to a large mass of additional testimony. The committee of the Ohio house had power only to inquire into the conduct of four members of that body. They report that—

"A number of clews furnished were not followed, because we were convinced that they could lead only to points at which further pursuit would become necessary, but which could not be passed without authority to reach beyond the limits of the State for witnesses, and much anonymous information was ignored by the committee chiefly for the same reason."

We have examined the evidence taken by that committee. It does not support the charges as to the four members implicated; it does not connect Mr. PAYNE with the transactions; it does not show that the result was changed or effected by corrupt means. But it does show that Mr. PAYNE's name was not publicly suggested as a candidate for Senator until after the State election; that it was not very prominently suggested until shortly before his election in January; that many persons who had been supposed to favor Pendleton voted for PAYNE; that there was a widespread belief that corrupt means were used to procure the result; that one member was offered a large sum of money by another member to vote for PAYNE; that there were hearsay statements charging corruption as to several others; that two members of the Legislature received large sums of money about the time of the election, of which they, being called as witnesses, gave no satisfactory account; that the prominent managers of Mr. PAYNE's canvass, namely, Paige, McLean, Huntington, and Oliver H. Payne, did not testify before the committee. There was no evidence tending to show the bribery of any particular member, except as above stated.

When we say it was not shown that the result was changed or effected by corrupt means we are speaking of direct testimony. But the consideration should not be forgotten that where persons familiar with the whole case would be quite sure to know whether such means were needful to change the result, or whether their candidate would be elected without it, if they are found expending large sums of money corruptly the fact alone affords strong reason for the inference that the result was thereby controlled. But the result of the investigation in Ohio seems to the undersigned absolutely unimportant. That committee, while they took a wider range of inquiry than the matter committed to them, neither had, nor conceived they had, any power to inquire into Mr. PAYNE's title to his seat. They issued no process extending beyond the limits of Ohio. They report no conclusion, except as to the four members. When witnesses refused to answer they did not press them. They went beyond the scope of the resolution appointing them only, as they say, "to gain something like a comprehensive view of the situation."

The Ohio senate of 1883-'84 contained 33 members. Of these 22 were Democrats and 11 Republicans. The house contained 105 members, of which 60 were Democrats and 45 Republicans. The members entitled to vote on joint ballot were 138 in all, 82 Democrats and 56 Republicans. Eighty-two persons were entitled to vote in the Democratic caucus, of whom 42 were a majority. Seventy-nine persons actually attended that caucus, of which 40 were a majority. Is there fair reason for instituting an inquiry whether the result of the election was procured by bribery? We think that the character of the persons making the charge is of itself sufficient to require the Senate to listen to it. But they produce a great body of evidence all pointing in the same direction.

We are not now to consider whether the case is proved, or even whether there be a prima facie case. There has as yet been no evidence laid before us addressed to either of these considerations. That can not be done without the issue of process for the attendance of witnesses. Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH now offer, on their personal responsibility, to establish to the satisfaction of the Senate, largely by witnesses who were not within the reach of the Ohio committee, and partly by evidence which strengthens, supplements, and confirms that which was before that committee, the following among other propositions:

First. That of the Democratic members elected to the Sixty-sixth General Assembly more than three-fourths were positively pledged to Mr. Pendleton and General Ward, and more than a majority pledged to Mr. Pendleton. This they offer to prove by Mr. Pendleton himself, by Col. W. A. Taylor, and others.

Second. That in these pledges these members represented the opinion and desire of their constituents.

Third. That Mr. PAYNE was nowhere spoken of or known as a candidate during the popular election or until a very short time before the appointment of Senator.

Fourth. That just before the legislative caucus, where the nomination was made, which was one week before the election, large sums of money were placed by Mr. PAYNE's son and other near friends of his at the control of the active managers of his canvass in Columbus. This they allege can be shown by the books of one or more banks.

Fifth. Mr. PAYNE's near friends declared that his election has cost very large sums.

A gentleman whose name is offered to be given will testify that David R. Paige declared to him that he had handled $65,000.

Oliver B. Payne stated to the same person that it had cost him $100,000 to elect his father.

Sixth. That the members of the Legislature who changed from Pendleton to PAYNE did so after secret and confidential interviews with the agents who had the disbursement of these moneys.

Seventh. That members of the Legislature who so suddenly changed their attitude can be proved to have, at about the time of the change, acquired large sums of money, of which they give no satisfactory account.

Eighth. Respectable Ohio Democrats affirm that just before the caucus the room of Mr. PAYNE's manager, Paige, "was like a banking house," that "the evidence of large sums of money there was abundant and conclusive," that Paige's clerk declared in the presence of a gentleman of integrity that "he had never seen so much money handled in his life."

Ninth. That the public belief that the choice of Senator was procured by the corrupt use of money prevails almost universally in Ohio among persons of both parties, which finds very general expression in the press.

Tenth. That there is specific proof leading with great force to the conclusion that each of ten members will be shown to have changed their votes corruptly, and thereby that the result was changed.

The Senate has also recently referred to the committee certain resolutions adopted by a convention of the Republican editors of Ohio, held at Columbus July 8, 1886, praying the Senate to investigate these charges. The newspaper reports of the convention show that the governor of the State was present at the convention and declared his concurrence in said prayer. There have also been communicated to us extracts from the Democratic newspapers of Ohio, showing that a majority of those papers have declared their opinion that the election was procured by corruption. Copies of these extracts are appended.

What is the effect upon an election of Senator of bribery of voters in a caucus of the legislators who are to make the choice, is a question upon which we prefer not to form an opinion until the evidence is before us. The members of a caucus ordinarily deem themselves bound in honor to vote in the election for the person whom it nominates, by the vote of a majority, on condition that such person belong to their party, and is fit for the office in point of character and ability. Bribery, therefore, which changes the result in the caucus, would ordinarily determine the election.

If B, C, and D have promised to vote as A shall vote, if A be corrupted four votes are gained by the process, although B, C, and D be innocent. In looking, therefore, to see whether an election by the Legislature was procured or effected by bribery, it may be very important to discover whether that bribery procured the nomination of a caucus whose action a majority of the Legislature were bound in honor to support. Seventy-nine persons attended the Senatorial caucus and voted on the first ballot. Of these Mr. PAYNE had the votes of 46, Ward 17, Pendleton 15, Booth 1. If 6 only of Mr. PAYNE's votes in the caucus were procured by bribery, the result of the election of Senator was clearly brought about by that means. Now, Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH tender specific proof, part of which was before the Ohio committee and part here offered for the first time, directly and very strongly tending to create the belief as to each of 10 of the members of the Ohio Legislature that his vote for Mr. PAYNE was purchased, and that proper process and inquiry will establish the fact by competent and sufficient evidence.

One member, after the caucus, deposited $2,500 in two amounts, and being charged that it was the price of his vote did not persist in a denial.

Another, who changed to PAYNE, just before the caucus stated to a colleague that he was offered $5,000 to vote for PAYNE, and intended to accept it, and tried to induce his colleague to do the same. That person's wife just afterward deposited $2,500 in a bank in Toledo, took a certificate therefor, which she transferred to her husband.

Another who is claimed to have changed suddenly from Pendleton to PAYNE is found making, soon after, expenditures amounting to $1,600 with his own money on land, the title to which was taken in the name of his father, who paid $2,000 for it about the same time. The father and son lived together in the same house. The son testified that he did not know where the father got the money to pay the $2,000. The father refused to state where he got his $2,000, and said he did not know where the son got the $1,600, and if he did he would not tell. The same member also made other large payments of money about the same time.

Another, who had to borrow money when he went to Columbus, and changed suddenly from Pendleton to PAYNE, was shown just after the election to be in possession of money to purchase property, refurnish his house, &c. He was denounced by another member as having sold his vote. He turned exceedingly sick, made no denial, and was taken away. Two others, elected as anti-monopolists, became supporters of Mr. PAYNE and were heard discussing together the amount of money each had received. Another, who had before been for another candidate, but voted for Mr. PAYNE, received from Oliver B. Payne $3,500, which he said was a loan. Another, according to affidavits produced by Mr. LITTLE, was declared by a fellow-member to be claiming $3,500 for his vote. Another, who had been very earnest in support of Pendleton, visited the room of Mr. PAYNE's managers, where the large sums of money are alleged to have been seen, and immediately afterward voted for Mr. PAYNE.

The committee received this communication from Messrs. Little and BUTTERWORTH in addition to the statements made by them at the hearing:

DEAR SIR: Since our appearance before your committee the last time, we have received information, deemed by us important, bearing upon the question of investigation, and desire to indicate its general character.

First. We have information, regarded trustworthy, that a member of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly, one of the sudden converts to PAYNE, with meager means and without financial credit prior to January, 1884, was able to and did deposit in bank to his own credit shortly after the election, to wit, February 13, 1884, $1,330, besides showing other signs of prosperity not accountable for in ordinary ways.

Second. We can show by a witness whose credibility will not be questioned that just prior to the meeting of the caucus at which Mr. PAYNE was nominated he (witness) was, in the interest of PAYNE, summoned by telegraph to Columbus. He went, and was asked by PAYNE's managers what sum of money would be required to withdraw the vote of the representative of his (witness') county from Pendleton and give it to PAYNE. The question was squarely and seriously addressed to witness: "How much money does he (the representative) want?"

Third. We have from reliable sources additional information of a convincing nature pointing to bribery, consisting of conversation, statements, and admissions of implicated members and others, which we are not at liberty to state more explicitly in this communication, owing to the conditions under which the information is imparted, but which, with the other matters referred to, we can verbally communicate to you in more particular form if desired.

In the line of matter heretofore submitted we deem it worth while to give this additional instance:

Fourth. We quote from a letter in our possession from a responsible person in Ohio, omitting names:

"Our representative, ——, had been elected as a Pendleton man, and had agreed —— to support Pendleton. A few days before the caucus it was whispered that '—— had been seen,' and that he would vote for PAYNE. A telegram was at once sent from here to —— (the member) by leading Democrats, warning him against such a course, and —— and others at once went to Columbus and saw the member. He hooted at the idea that he would vote for PAYNE. —— assured Pendleton that the member would support him. —— then came home feeling confident that the member would not disappoint him."

This member was interviewed in the presence of a friend of Mr. Pendleton, and asserted his devotion to him, but was suspected and watched. As the hour of the caucus approached it was noticed that he was not present. The friend of Mr. Pendleton went to his room for him. We quote further:

"He found him in company with one of the men who handled the 'boodle,' and he was much embarrassed by ——'s presence. But he went to the caucus with ——, and on the way again asserted his allegiance to Pendleton. If I remember correctly, —— said they had printed ballots for both candidates, and that he gave —— (the member) a Pendleton ticket. But when the vote was taken —— (Pendleton's friend) observed that —— (the member) wrote something on a piece of legal-cap and then tore it off. He afterward discovered that —— (the member) put in the hat the same piece of paper; and then —— (Pendleton's friend) went to ——'s (the member's) desk and tore off a piece of the legal-cap large enough to include the small piece torn off by —— (the member). I think —— (Pendleton's friend) was one of the tellers. At any rate, he got the ballot which fitted the piece of legal-cap, and which —— had voted, and found that PAYNE's name was on the ballot."

This member was thereupon charged by the Democratic county paper of his county with betrayal, &c.

We do not question that the facts can be shown substantially as indicated with respect to the member referred to.

Should this information not be used names and means of identity placed on record would or might lead to annoyances for no purpose. They are, therefore, not here given.

Your committee, we will venture to add in conclusion, will not overlook the fact that our showing, made in the face of a most persistent and powerful opposition of unlimited means and expedients, has been one for an investigation, and not final action following an investigation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN LITTLE.
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
Chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections,
United States Senate.

It is said that much of this is hearsay and that taken together it is insufficient to establish a case which will overcome the presumption arising from the certificate of election. We are not now dealing with that question. The Senate is to determine whether there is probable cause for an inquiry. Any man who lays a claim to any property, real or personal, may institute his process at pleasure, and compel the courts to hear and try the cause. Even a criminal accusation requires only the oath of the accuser, who is justified, if he have probable cause.

It will not be questioned that in every one of these cases there is abundant probable cause which would justify a complaint and compel a grand jury or magistrate to issue process and make an investigation. Is the Senate to deny to the people of a great State, speaking through their Legislature and their representative citizens, the only opportunity for a hearing of this momentous case which can exist under the Constitution? We have not prejudged the case, nor do we mean to prejudge it. We sincerely trust that the investigation, which is as much demanded for the honor of the sitting member as for that of the Senate or the State of Ohio, may result in vindicating his title to his seat and the good name of the Legislature that elected him.

But we can not consent to be accomplices in denying justice to either. We do not believe the American people will be satisfied that the Senate should refuse to hear this case either on the ground that some other tribunal has tried some other case, or on the ground that it has already been decided without hearing or evidence, or on the ground that a bribe paid for a vote in a legislative caucus is not understood by both parties to include a vote in the Legislature for the candidate of that caucus.

How can a question of bribery ever be raised or ever be investigated if the arguments against this investigation prevail? You do not suppose that the men who bribe or the men who are bribed will volunteer to furnish evidence against themselves. You do not expect that impartial and unimpeachable witnesses will be present at the transaction. Ordinarily, of course, if a claim like this be brought to the attention of the Senate from a respectable quarter that a title to a seat here was obtained by corrupt means, the Senator concerned will hasten to demand an investigation. But that is wholly within his own discretion, and does not affect the due mode of procedure by the Senate. From the nature of the case the process of the Senate must compel the persons who conducted the canvass and the persons who made the election to appear and disclose what they know; and until that process issue, you must act upon such information only as is enough to cause inquiry in the ordinary affairs of life.

The question now is not whether the case is proved—it is only whether it shall be inquired into. That has never yet been done. It can not be done until the Senate issues its process. No unwilling witness has ever yet been compelled to testify; no process has gone out which could cross State lines. The Senate is now to determine, as the law of the present case and as the precedent for all future cases, as to the great crime of bribery—a crime which poisons the waters of republican liberty in the fountain—that the circumstances which here appear are not enough to demand its attention.

It will hardly be doubted that cases of purchase of seats in the Senate will multiply rapidly under the decision proposed by the majority of the committee. The first great precedent to constitute the rule under this branch of law is to be this:

Held, by the Senate of the United States, that a charge made by the Legislature of a State, and by the committee of the political party to which the larger number of its citizens belong, and by ten of its Representatives in Congress, that an election of Senator was procured by bribery, accompanied by the offer to prove the fact, does not deserve the attention of the Senate, and this, although it also appear—

That there is a general and widespread public belief in the truth of the charge; that there was a sudden and unexpected and unaccounted for change to the sitting member from another candidate to whom a majority of the electing body had been previously pledged; that large sums of money were brought to the place of election just before the choice by the managers of the canvass for the person elected; that there is evidence tending to show the bribery of several members, and the acquisition by others, who so changed their support, of considerable sums of money immediately after such change, affect at least ten members of said legislature; that a change by corrupt means of the votes of six persons would have changed the result in a legislative caucus, and thereby bound and committed the vote in the Legislature of eighty-two persons, who wer a large majority of such Legislature.

Provided it also appear that one branch of a subsequent Legislature of the same State have, in investigating charges against four of their members, incidentally inquired into charges against other persons so far as they could without compelling unwilling witnesses to answer, without use of process extending beyond their State, and "without following out many clews which they did not follow because they were convinced that they would lead only to points of which further pursuit would become necessary."

We recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to investigate the charges affecting the title to the seat of the Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE, and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and employ a clerk and stenographer, and to sit during the recess of the Senate; and that the expenses of the investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

GEORGE F. HOAR.
WM. P. FRYE.

Report made by Mr. HOAR, chairman of the committee to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I have examined the evidence forwarded by the house of representatives of Ohio.

The investigation was under a resolution directing an inquiry as to the charges that four members of the present Legislature, being also members of the last, were guilty of being induced by corrupt means to vote for Mr. PAYNE.

These charges were not sustained, and the committee so report.

But the inquiry took a wider range. There was evidence tending to show—

That Mr. PAYNE's name was not publicly suggested as a candidate for Senator until after the State election;

That it was not very prominently suggested until shortly before his election in January;

That many persons who had been supposed to favor Pendleton voted for PAYNE;

That there was a widespread belief that corrupt means were used to procure the result;

That one member was offered a large sum of money for his vote by another member;

That there were hearsay statements charging corruption as to several others;

That two members of the Legislature received large sums of money about the time of the election, of which they being called as witnesses gave no satisfactory account;

That the principal managers of Mr. PAYNE's canvass, namely, Paige, McLean, Huntington, and Oliver H. Payne, did not testify before the committee, but there is not evidence tending to show the bribery of any member unless as above stated;

There is no evidence to connect Mr. PAYNE, the sitting member, with these transactions;

And none tending to show that the result was changed or affected by such means;

Informed that Mr. Little wishes to be heard;

That these persons kept out of State and reach of process.

RECESS.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, if this matter is disposed of, I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock, and that this evening we devote what time is possible to the examination of the sundry civil bill, so that to-morrow may be devoted to this matter of which gentlemen have spoken, as I suppose there is no desire to go on with the Payne case to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. COCKRELL. I appeal to the Senator not to force a night session. We can readily transact all the business in proper time without night sessions. Night sessions are not productive of good results.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CONGER. I ask what the proposition before the Senate is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Allison,	Frye,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Berry,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Gray,	Manderson,	Sewell,

Cullom,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Pugh,	Wilson of Iowa.
Evarts,	Kenna,	Ransom,

NAYS—20.

Blackburn,	Cameron,	Gibson,	Plumb,
Brown,	Cockrell,	Hampton,	Vance,
Butler,	Coke,	Hawley,	Vest,
Call,	Eustis,	Mahone,	Walthall,

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at 8 o'clock p. m.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the sundry civil appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9478) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, as is the usual custom, and also that the amendments may be considered in their order, first considering the amendments reported from the Committee on Appropriations as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be proceeded with and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be considered as reached in the reading. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the intention of the chairman of the committee concerning this bill to-night? I ask for information to ascertain whether there is any design of proceeding further than the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir. I will say that I do not expect to finish the bill to-night in the Committee of the Whole. I have agreed with some Senators who desire to debate at some length one or two amendments to pass them over.

Mr. INGALLS. There are some amendments which are of considerable importance, and about which there is likely to be debate, and if they are all to remain open, notwithstanding the action of the Senate to-night, of course the discussion will not be concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the amendments will all remain open for action in the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Everything will remain open.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not expect to finish the bill as in Committee of the Whole to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

CALL OF THE SENATE.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, what has been done, I should like to ask? No quorum is here. I should like to find out what we have done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is being read now.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I have come here, I should like to have the rest come here too. I ask for a call of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senators will come in in a few moments. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist on a call of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not fair nor right to transact important business without a quorum.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Iowa has just advised me, before the Senator from Missouri came in, that this is a purely formal proceeding.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I did not say that.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, in effect it is. He said that the amendments are all to remain open, and that this is a reading of the bill for the purpose of going through the amendments pro forma as in Committee of the Whole, and that there is no design of finishing the bill at all as in Committee of the Whole this evening. So I suppose that nothing will be lost by proceeding in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it the right way to transact public business with only eight or ten Senators? I have heard the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] so often appeal to the Senate not to do business unconstitutionally and out of order, and without having notice that he had omitted that duty which he has always been in the habit of performing I involuntarily called attention to the fact that there is no quorum here, and that I did not think we ought to transact business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We probably, for aught the Senator knows, had a quorum when we began, and perhaps Senators have gone out to smoke. We did not have the presence of my friend from Missouri when the recess expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only missed two or three minutes. If we had a quorum when we commenced, a call of the Senate will bring Senators back out of the cloak-rooms.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to the call, and there must be one now that the Senator says there is no quorum, and it is the duty of the Chair to order the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Teller,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Vance,
Berry,	Evarts,	McMillan,	Whitthorne,
Blair,	Hampton,	Palmer,	Wilson of Md.
Brown,	Harrison,	Sherman,
Butler,	Hawley,	Spooner,

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read the names of those present.

Mr. ALLISON. I think in a moment Senators will be in.

The Secretary read the list of those present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-two Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No quorum is present. Call the list of absentees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The list of absentees will be called.

The Secretary read the list of absent Senators, as follows:

Messrs. Aldrich, Blackburn, Bowen, Call, Camden, Cameron, Chace, Coke, Colquitt, Conger, Cullom, Dawes, Dolph, Eustis, Fair, Frye, George, Gibson, Gorman, Gray, Hale, Harris, Hearst, Jones of Arkansas, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kenna, Logan, McPherson, Mahone, Manderson, Maxey, Miller, Mitchell of Oregon, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Morgan, Morrill, Payne, Pike, Platt, Plumb, Pugh, Ransom, Riddleberger, Sabin, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sewell, Stanford, Van Wyck, Vest, Voorhees, Walthall, and Wilson, of Iowa—54.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is not in the city. He is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is also absent from the city.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, appeared, and answered to his name.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] left a few moments before adjournment this evening, and I think he does not know there is a session to-night.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] was called down the city on some important business and requested me to say that he would be here by 9 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM, Mr. COLQUITT, Mr. MAHONE, Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. WALTHALL appeared, and answered to their names.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask how many Senators are now present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-nine Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be requested to notify the absent Senators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That he be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. That is the phrase.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. If there is no objection that order will be made.

Mr. CALL and Mr. PAYNE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. VANCE. Would it be in order to inquire where those patriots are who moved for this recess?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. VANCE. Whether it is a parliamentary inquiry or an unparliamentary one, I voted against the recess myself, because I thought I knew the frame of Senators and remembered that they were dust; and sure enough we are here now waiting half an hour after the time, and we have not a quorum.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is very obvious that we shall not have a quorum to-night, and I move that the Senate adjourn. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not insist on the yeas and nays at this moment. Let us take a division first.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 3, noes 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. How many do we lack of a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-one Senators have responded to their names.

Mr. CHACE, Mr. DOLPH, Mr. PLATT, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. MILLER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture in charge of the oleomargarine bill that passed so successfully is present. That makes a quorum I know, and I think we can now proceed to the consideration of business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can not do it now until the record itself discloses the presence of a quorum. Until that time we can not go on.

Mr. SAWYER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe there is a quorum now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. GORMAN and Mr. KENNA entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-nine Senators having answered to their names, the Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Coast Defenses, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the fortification appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVARTS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the fortification appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported two amendments intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9478) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "public buildings," after the words "New York," at the end of line 19, to strike out "for approaches complete, exclusive of iron fence, $5,000" and insert "for repairs to building and sidewalk, $16,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For custom-house and post-office at Buffalo, N. Y.: For repairs to building and sidewalk, $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the clause from line 23 to line 25 inclusive, as follows:

For post-office at Brooklyn, N. Y.: For completion of building under present limit, $165,000.

Mr. MILLER. I should be glad to have the chairman of the committee give the Senate the reasons for striking out the appropriation for the Brooklyn post-office. It may be all right, but I desire to know the views of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. This appropriation for the Brooklyn post-office stands as several other appropriations do with reference to the limit of cost. The original limit of cost of the Brooklyn post-office was $800,000. They have already expended $462,000 for a site. That may not be the exact sum, but as I remember it it is $462,000 for a site. It is manifestly impossible to complete a suitable building at Brooklyn with the remaining appropriation. It is equally unnecessary to begin the erection of that building until a suitable law is passed with reference to the limit. This hundred thousand dollars if appropriated could not be expended until the limit is removed, and so the committee report to strike it out.

Mr. MILLER. Was not the work commenced?

Mr. ALLISON. I think the foundation has been laid for the building, but they desire, I think, to purchase a still further piece of ground to enlarge the foundation, and the building can not progress further without an additional appropriation and the removal of the present limit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 26, after the word "Illinois," to strike out:

That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $20,000 made by the act approved March 3, 1885, for "filling and grading" is hereby made available for completion of the approaches and completion of the buildings.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For completion of the approaches and buildings, $4,279.63.

So as to make the clause read:

For marine hospital at Cairo, Ill.: For completion of the approaches and buildings, $4,279.63.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether the amendment is a reduction of the amount appropriated by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the exact sum remaining unexpended.

Mr. CULLOM. I had that impression, but I was not sure of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 33, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Carson City, Nev.: For approaches and heating apparatus complete, $17,000.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to inquire whether any amendments to the amendments of the committee are now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Amendments are not in order until the amendments of the committee are acted upon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 37 and 38, as follows:

For custom-house at Charleston, S. C.: For completing wharf, $40,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust that that amendment of the committee will not be adopted. I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee would consent to have it non-concurred in, and I move without further remark that the Senate do not concur in the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word as to the reason which operated upon the committee in striking out this item. This is for the completion of a wharf at this point. It so happens that the custom-house at Charleston is near the harbor, and I believe, what I did not thoroughly understand before, that the Government owns not only the building and the grounds about it, but also has purchased the open space between that and the harbor.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Now this is an appropriation for the building of a wharf.

Mr. BUTLER. For the completion of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, it is for the completion of a wharf, and an appropriation of $35,000 having already been made, the committee did not believe it a wise thing for the Government to undertake the building of wharves, because there will be difficulty respecting what shall be charged for the use of those wharves. They will have to be maintained in connection with private wharves, and it seemed to the committee wiser for the Government to dispense with this wharf rather than to build it, maintain it, and dredge out the harbor in front of it, and be at a continual expense with reference to it.

That was the motive which the committee had. It may be wise or otherwise; I do not know.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator is not correctly informed as to the situation of the wharf, for I have been there personally and have seen its very lamentable condition. The custom-house faces the harbor of Charleston, and I do not suppose it is more than 40 or 50 yards from the front of the custom-house to the water. All the Government vessels land there, or should land there, the revenue-cutter and the tugs for the completion of the jetties, and in fact every Government vessel, and it is in a very dilapidated and unsightly condition. A part of the improvement has been completed. It was repaired by palmetto logs after destruction by a storm some years ago. The storm of 1880 and 1881 very seriously damaged that again.

The proposition now is to put a concrete wharf there, so as to be free from the effect of the toredo, the worm which was destructive of former structures. A great deal of the material is lying there. Some of the granite has been gotten out, and really the Government is suffering great loss by not having the work completed.

The House after a full investigation put the appropriation in the bill, and I submit that there is every reason in the world why this wharf should be completed. I therefore make the motion that the Senate do not concur in this amendment. I do not know exactly what form of motion is the proper one to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The form of the question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the committee? The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BECK. There are some estimates in regard to this improvement which I should like to see. The estimate of the Department is only $10,000.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have a letter addressed to a colleague in the other House by Mr. Bell, Supervising Architect of the Treasury, which I will read. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
February 16, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant in relation to the appropriation asked for the completion of the custom-house wharf at Charleston, S. C.

The latest examination of the work established the fact that it will not be practicable to proceed with the construction of the wharf as originally contemplated. The crib foundation upon which it was proposed to place the granite superstructure is found to be insecure and can not be made permanent except at such an expense as to exceed the present limit of cost. To construct the wharf as it should be, with a concrete-block foundation that will secure a depth of water at the wharf of not less than 12 feet at mean low tide, an appropriation of $40,000 will be required instead of $10,000, as contemplated by the estimate of appropriation submitted in November last. I feel assured that a continuation of the work under the original plan of operations would result unsatisfactorily, and that a permanent piece of work can be secured only by the use of a concrete-block foundation.

Respectfully, yours,

M. E. BELL,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. SAMUEL DIBBLE,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
House of Representatives.

I have before me, but I will not detain the Senate by reading them, letters from the collector of the port of Charleston and others calling attention to the dilapidated condition in which the wharf has been placed by the storms which have occurred there in recent years. There have been no improvements on the wharf since 1871, and there will be no difficulty in the world in securing any depth of water, for the whole water frontage of Charleston in that portion by the Coast Survey is 43 feet. The wharf frontage fills up by drift on account of the wharf having been destroyed.

I have here also a petition from the chamber of commerce, from the cotton exchange, and the merchants' exchange, or rather a telegraphic dispatch, saying that a petition has been mailed and is on the way here, asking for the completion of the wharf. I think that it is a matter of great consequence to the Government that this wharf should be put in proper condition. The Signal Service, the revenue-cutter, the light-house service, and the jetty service all land there, or ought to land there, and the collector writes to say that it is impossible for them to land there now in the condition of the wharf.

A large amount of money has already been expended, and I think it would be true economy to go on and make this small appropriation to complete the work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. ALLISON. I can not permit this to go without saying one word further. The estimate is $10,000. The House appropriated $40,000. It is not a question of building this wharf precisely. It is a question of maintaining it, whether the Government of the United States shall maintain wharves in harbors, because the Government has no use for this wharf except as was said a tug now and then may land there or a revenue-cutter may now and then land there.

In addition to building this wharf, the moment it is built there must be a large amount of dredging done for the purpose of preparing this slip or harbor for use, and that dredging must be done in connection with private parties and private owners of wharves.

I submit this statement to the judgment of the Senate that it may determine whether this is a wise thing for the Government to go into.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is mistaken about that. If the Government does not complete this wharf it must pay wharfage elsewhere at private wharves. I know there is the greatest depth of water right in front of the custom-house. Perhaps immediately along the shore there may be some dredging required, but the private wharves have nothing to do with it. The Government has nothing whatever to do with private wharves. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I stated upon my own information that I have been there myself and have seen the condition of the wharf; and therefore I trust the Senator will not insist upon the amendment when the House after full investigation have put the amount of $40,000 in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HAMPTON. I was just calling the attention of the chairman of the committee privately to the fact that in the estimate which came in from the Architect only yesterday the amount required for dredging is $3,000. There is no private wharf that will be at all concerned so far as this one is. There is plenty of water within a few feet of this wharf as it now stands, and it has only been filled up because it has been so neglected that the débris of the wharf and the washings of the streets are carried down into it and have filled it up. But the report of the Coast Survey will show that along that whole front there is from 40 to 43 feet of water.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly there is; there is 40 feet of water right in front of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 41, to insert:

For custom-house and post-office at Chicago, Ill.: For extraordinary repairs, $65,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 46 to line 48, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Denver, Colo.: For completion of building under present limit, $97,000.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to correct the text and to offer an amendment to that clause. I suppose it is the proper time to do that now. I move to strike out the words in line 47, "for completion of building under present limit" and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the words "for completion of building under present limit" and to insert after the word "dollars:"

That the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Denver, Colo.," approved May 8, 1882, be amended by making the limit for said building $575,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost thereof. And the Supervising Architect and the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are authorized and required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed in making plans and contracts for the erection of said building.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on that. If the Senator will allow me one moment, as it may have some significance, and it is an entirely different proposition from the clause proposed to be stricken out by the committee, I hope the Senator will allow the committee amendment to be agreed to now and go back to the clause afterward.

Mr. TELLER. That is exactly the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. What committee?

Mr. TELLER. Of course it is an entirely different amendment from what is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, which is to strike out the appropriation altogether. The amendment I have offered was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and reported favorably from that committee. Consequently the point of order, as I understand, does not lie against it.

Mr. ALLISON. It changes existing law.

Mr. TELLER. It is indorsed by the proper officers of the Department in addition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order at this time, at any rate.

Mr. TELLER. Why not at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are alone to be considered in this reading of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. If the amendment of the committee is adopted and the whole clause goes out, I should have to move hereafter to restore that which is stricken out by the Senate. That can not be. I do not know much about parliamentary rules, but it seems to me that it can hardly be possible that before the Senate votes on the question to strike out it will not be in order for me to move to perfect the text. I think I am entitled to perfect the text before the Senate votes on striking out.

Mr. ALLISON. It changes the existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is not in order under the rule.

Mr. TELLER. In the first place I want to say that the amendment was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and so is brought strictly within the rules. Besides that, it is indorsed by the Treasury Department, which brings it within the rule. If it is not within the rule it is not possible to make any amendment of this character to an appropriation bill. I have seen this done a hundred times in the Senate, and I am confident it is not out of order.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the Senator from Colorado that both the amendment of the committee and the other amendment be passed over for the present until we get to the end of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will agree to that.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over informally.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 49 and 50, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Detroit, Mich.: For continuation of building, $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that may be passed over for the present. I want to see further in respect to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 50, to insert:

For custom-house and post-office at El Paso, Tex.: For procuring site and commencing the erection of building, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 56, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Fort Smith, Ark.: For approaches and heating apparatus complete, $21,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 59, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Fort Wayne, Ind.: For heating apparatus, elevator, and approaches complete, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 63 to line 69, as follows:

For custom-house at Galveston, Tex.: That the sum of $25,000 appropriated by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 7, 1884, for continuation of the court-house and post-office, be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made available for the completion of the custom-house at Galveston, Tex.

Mr. COKE. I hope this amendment will not be concurred in. The act of August 7, 1882, provided for the erection of a custom-house building at Galveston, Tex., and appropriated $62,500. The act of March 3, 1885, appropriated $37,500 for this purpose, making in all $100,000. The limit prescribed by the act of 1882 providing for the erection of the building was $125,000. One hundred thousand dollars has been properly appropriated of that amount. An attempt was made in 1884 to appropriate the other $25,000, but there was a mistake, and it was designated "For court-house and post-office; continuation of building $25,000." It was intended to be for this custom-house, because there was no court-house and post-office being built at Galveston. The custom-house building was the only building being constructed there.

I have before me the correspondence of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, calling on the Attorney-General, stating this mistake, and asking to know if he could use this $25,000 for the construction of the custom-house, that being evidently and certainly the building for which it was intended. The Attorney-General replies that he can not. The House, in view of these facts, makes the appropriation in these words:

For custom-house at Galveston, Tex.: That the sum of $25,000 appropriated by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 7, 1884, for continuation of the court-house and post-office, be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made available for the completion of the custom-house at Galveston, Tex.

It is simply the correction of a mistake made in 1884, when Congress instead of making the appropriation for the custom-house made it for the court-house and post-office.

Mr. HARRIS. It was a mistake in the name of the house; that is all.

Mr. COKE. That is all. Now this appropriation is stricken out by the committee. I hope the committee amendment striking it out will not be concurred in. All I desire is an appropriation of the money for the building.

Mr. BECK. I think the Senator from Texas would get along better to let this money, which was wrongly appropriated, remain in the Treasury, as it now is, and let the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations striking it out stand, and insert:

For the completion of the custom-house at Galveston, Tex., $25,000.

Making a clean appropriation and letting the whole matter correct itself.

Mr. COKE. That is the amount needed for that purpose, and that form would suit just as well.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to make a brief explanation before that is done. There are two public buildings at Galveston, a custom-house and a court-house and post-office. In 1884, or whenever it was done, an appropriation was made for one of these buildings. Then Congress authorized the construction of an entire new building at Galveston, and limited the cost to $100,000. If this appropriation can be switched over upon the new building Galveston will stand in a better relation in reference to this bill than other people who have appropriations without a limit. The object of this transfer of an appropriation which has gone into the Treasury is to add to the limit of the Galveston building $25,000. It should be done directly, if done at all. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky is the true suggestion.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? There is a court-house and post-office building at Galveston. It has been there many years. No appropriation has been asked for it; no work has been done on it; no work is contemplated being done on it. All that has been asked for since 1882 has been for the new custom-house now in process of erection. In 1882 the law provided for the erection of that custom-house, fixing the limit for the site of the building at $125,000. It was in 1884, two years after that, that this $25,000 appropriation was made in which the mistake occurred. It makes it exactly. Without that $25,000 there is $100,000 appropriated for the custom-house at Galveston. With it there is $125,000 appropriated, which is the limit fixed by the act of 1882.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator say that when this appropriation is transferred, with all the other appropriations which have been made, the limit then will only be reached?

Mr. COKE. That is what appears from the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is true, then the point I make would not lie.

Mr. BECK. It was because I believed that to be true that I made the suggestion I did.

Mr. COKE. It was $62,500 in one appropriation and $37,500 in another, making $100,000, and this $25,000 now asked for simply comes up to the limit of the law of 1882.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was the first appropriation for the custom-house at Galveston?

Mr. ALLISON. In 1882.

Mr. COKE. The law was passed August 7, 1882.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Texas that the committee was fortified somewhat in this view of the question from the fact that there is $89,000 of the appropriation still unexpended.

Mr. COKE. Here is a letter to the Solicitor of the Treasury from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. COKE. February 18, 1886. He put down the limit for the site and building under the act providing for the erection of the building at $125,000. He says.

The act of August 7, 1882, appropriates $62,500 for custom-house and other Government offices. The act of July 7, 1884, appropriates for court-house and post-office, for continuation of building, $25,000.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator is correct in his statement, I should have been obliged if he had handed me that letter, because it is new.

Mr. COKE. Do you desire to see the letter?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not desire to see it now. I ask that the amendment may be passed over in order that I can examine it. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the reason why we struck the clause out was because we understood the limit had been exceeded. Now that he says the limit is not exceeded I am in favor, and I think the committee would be in favor, of appropriating specifically $25,000 more for this work.

Mr. COKE. I am willing to let the amendment go over, because I am satisfied that it is just as I have stated, and the committee will find it so.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 69, to insert:

For post-office at Hannibal, Mo.: For approaches and heating apparatus complete, $13,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "fencing," at the end of line 74, to strike out "seven thousand five hundred" and insert "eleven thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For court-house and post-office at Jefferson City, Mo.: For approaches complete, exclusive of iron fencing, $11,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 90, after the word "fence," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred;" and after the words "in all," at the end of line 92, to strike out "five thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For court-house and post-office at Leavenworth, Kans.: For approaches complete, exclusive of iron fence, $4,500; for connection to city sewer, $14.03; in all, $4,514.03.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the following item:

For post-office at Minneapolis, Minn.: For continuation of building, $125,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Would an amendment to the text in this instance be in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not be in order.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "fence," at the end of line 107, to strike out "seven thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For court-house and post-office at Nebraska City, Nebr.: For approaches complete, exclusive of iron fence, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the clause from line 109 to line 112, inclusive, as follows:

For marine hospital at New Orleans, La.: For laundry building and apparatus, $2,500; and approaches complete, $7,500; in all, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 112, to insert:

For mint building at New Orleans, La.: For extraordinary repairs absolutely necessary, $23,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 115, to insert:

For post-office at New Bedford, Mass.: For the purchase of land adjoining and additional to that authorized to be purchased by the act of February 20, 1885, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 127, after the word "complete," to strike out "exclusive of iron fence, five" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

For court-house and post-office at Pensacola, Fla.: For approaches complete, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 131, to insert:

For custom-house and post-office at Port Townsend, Wash.: For approaches and heating apparatus complete, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 138, after the word "complete," to strike out "exclusive of iron fence, five," and insert "nine;" so as to make the clause read:

For post-office and court-house at Quincy, Ill.: For approaches complete, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 145, to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Saint Paul, Minn.: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the ground, consisting of two lots, adjoining the United States court-house and post-office building in the city of Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota, fronting not to exceed 100 feet on Wabash street and extending back to the depth of the said lots, $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Iowa has an amendment which I submitted to him that had better be added there.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee authorize me to move to insert, after the word "lots," in line 152:

Or in his discretion ground adjoining the said premises of the United States and fronting not to exceed 100 feet on Fifth street, and extending back the depth of said Government premises.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is suggested that the name of the street is wrong. It should be "Wabashaw."

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, Wabashaw.

Mr. ALLISON. That ought to be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 153, to insert:

For post-office at Springfield, Ohio: For approaches and heating apparatus complete, $12,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that amendment may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. Mr. EDMUNDS. That is already in.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment should be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, after line 274, to insert:

Cape Meares light-house, Oregon: For the purchase of a site and completing the construction of a first-order coast light-house at Cape Meares, Tillamook Bay, Oregon, $60,000.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I move to strike out "sixty," before "thousand," and insert "seventy-five." I will say to the chairman of the committee that that is the recommendation of the Department. Unless my friend is satisfied, I will ask to have the amendment go over until to-morrow, when I shall produce the papers.

Mr. ALLISON. We have inserted a large number of lights here in view of the fact that Congress recently passed a law directing these lights to be constructed; and for Cape Meares, Tillamook Bay, Oregon, the law limits the cost of construction to $60,000.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That is true, but at the same time the Department insists that it ought to be $75,000; that is, $15,000 more.

Mr. HALE. Congress has settled that.

Mr. ALLISON. The law must be changed next year, if at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 312, to insert:

Steam-tender for the fourth light-house district: For building and completing a new steam-tender for service in the fourth light-house district, $68,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 326.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to call the attention of the chairman to line 322, about life-saving stations:

On the coasts of Rhode Island and Long Island, one, at $1,800.

That means one each, I suppose. They are separate coasts.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; that is one superintendent for both.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can that be?

Mr. ALLISON. Rhode Island and Long Island are very closely allied. These are superintendents; they are men who have charge of a number of these stations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One person has charge on the mainland and on Long Island also?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not work.

Mr. ALLISON. It has worked for many years, I will say to the Senator. He has an assistant superintendent provided for right below.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, well; that may be.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say with reference to these life-saving stations that they are the stations which have been in existence for a number of years, and it is found to work very well in the service in which they are engaged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, under the head of "Revenue-cutter service," after line 388, to insert:

For the construction or purchase of a steam revenue-vessel for use on the Mississippi River between New Orleans and the passes, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for "Engraving and printing," after the word "Treasury," in line 429, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter receipts for miscellaneous work performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the several Departments of the Government, and the amounts properly chargeable to national banks for engraving their plates, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

So as to make the clause read:

For engravers', printers', and other materials, except distinctive paper, and for miscellaneous expenses, $141,820, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That hereafter receipts for miscellaneous work performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the several Departments of the Government, and the amounts properly chargeable to national banks for engraving their plates, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman to explain what classes of miscellaneous work other than the regular work of the bureau are lawfully performed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the several Departments of the Government, as distinguished from the Government Printing Office.

Mr. ALLISON. There are quite a number of things which the Bureau of Engraving and Printing do for the Government, such as printing Treasury drafts, Treasury checks, that are not enumerated in this list. The practice hitherto has been to pay for this work out of different appropriations, but the present Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing asks for a single appropriation covering all the work to be done in the bureau. He stated in his letter, which will be found in the report of the House committee, that he would continue to do this miscellaneous printing or engraving as hitherto, and would collect the sums from the various Departments and would cover the money into the Treasury under the head of miscellaneous receipts. But on examination of the law we found there was no law requiring him to do that, and so we thought we would take him at his word and give him the necessary authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to the propriety of that, only I am a little afraid that this language would authorize that bureau to set up a rival establishment in some respects to the Government Printing Office.

Mr. ALLISON. No, there is no conflict; these are small items; for instance, engraving post-office cards, engraving drafts of the Treasury and various others.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You think the law now authorizes that to be done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of it. It has been done there for a good many years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in order to be sure that we are not enlarging the scope of that bureau as to work that now must be done somewhere else, I suggest to amend in line 430 by inserting, after the word "work," the words "authorized by law to be," so as not to enlarge the authority.

Mr. ALLISON. There may be no special provision authorizing some of this special work.

Mr. HALE. I do not think there is any provision providing for the finer engraved work. It is not a thing that has given rise to any abuse.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have heard of some abuses in the way of printing, &c., that have been going on in that Department, and with the language of the clause, without my amendment, it would seem to be a general authority for all Departments of the Government to have any amount of engraving and printing done that they chose to have done, or printing without engraving, at the bureau rather than at the Government Printing Office, where the law now requires them to have it done.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will turn to the Book of Estimates, page 283, he will see a detailed statement of the character of work that is done, pension checks, interest checks, transfer checks, drafts, or warrants, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all right, and that I have no doubt the law does authorize.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think it does specifically.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think you will find in respect of all this proper Treasury work, in the way of fixing up their own work, they may do that; but my point is to prevent the implication that arises from this language of general authority to any of the Departments to have printing work done there because they may think it may be done a little nicer or finer than at the Government Printing Office. I want to keep it within the present limits of practical application.

I hope my amendment will be agreed to, and then if found between now and the time we get into the Senate that there is any trouble about it we can take it out of the bill.

Mr. HALE. There is no need of it whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think there is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 430, after the word "work," it is proposed to insert the words "authorized by law to be;" so as to read:

That hereafter receipts for miscellaneous work authorized by law to be performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendments from line 435 to line 454, inclusive, relating to the silver question, I ask may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be passed over if there be no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 464, after the word "therewith" to insert the words "and erecting necessary structures for employés at existing light stations;" so as to make the clause read:

Repairs of light-houses: For repairing, rebuilding, and improving light-houses, and buildings and grounds connected therewith, and erecting necessary structures for employés at existing light stations; for establishing and repairing pier-head lights; for illuminating apparatus and machinery to replace that already in use, and for incidental expenses relating to these various objects, $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 481, to increase the appropriation "for expenses of establishing, replacing, and maintaining buoys, spindles, and day-beacons, and for incidental expenses relating thereto," from $300,000 to $320,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 485, to increase the appropriation "for establishing, replacing, duplicating, and improving fog-signals and buildings connected therewith, and for repairs and incidental expenses of the same," from $50,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 494, after the word "Georgia," to insert the words "Saint John's River, Florida; Columbia and Willamette Rivers, Oregon;" and in line 497, after the word "rivers," to strike out "one hundred and seventy" and insert "two hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Lighting of rivers: For establishing, supplying, and maintaining post-lights on the Hudson River, New York; Cape Fear River, North Carolina; Savannah River, Georgia; Saint John's River, Florida; Columbia and Willamette Rivers, Oregon; at the mouth of Red River, Louisiana; Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the "Coast and Geodetic Survey," after the word "authority," in line 523, to strike out the words "and including traveling expenses of officers and men of the Navy on duty; for actual subsistence to officers of the field force while on field duty, at not exceeding two dollars per day each;" so as make the clause read.

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the survey of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts of the United States, including the survey of rivers to the head of tide-water or ship navigation; deep-sea soundings, temperature and current observations along the coasts and throughout the Gulf Stream and Japan Stream flowing off the said coasts; tidal observations; the necessary resurveys; the preparation of the Coast Pilot; a magnetic map of North America; and including compensation not otherwise appropriated for of persons employed on the field-work, in conformity with the regulations for the government of the Coast and Geodetic Survey adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury; for special examinations that may be required by the Light-House Board or other proper authority; outfit, equipment, and care of vessels used in the Survey, and also the repairs and maintenance of the complement of vessels, to be expended under the following heads: Provided, That no advance of money to chiefs of field parties under this appropriation shall be made unless to a commissioned officer or to a civilian officer, who shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "party expenses of Coast and Geodetic Survey," in line 539, to increase the appropriation "for examination of reported dangers and changes on the eastern coast" from $500 to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 545, to increase the appropriation "for continuing examination of changes and resurveys on the seacoast of New Jersey" from $1,800 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 553, to increase the appropriation "for continuing the survey of the western coast of Florida from Estero Bay southward and from Saint Joseph's Bay northward, and hydrography of same," from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 560, to increase the appropriation "to make off-shore soundings along the Atlantic coast and current and temperature observations in the Gulf Stream" from $6,000 to $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 567, to increase the appropriation "for determinations of geographical positions (longitude party)" from $2,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 569, to increase the appropriation "to continue the primary triangulation from Atlanta toward Mobile" from $2,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 569, to insert:

To continue the primary triangulation between Charleston, S. C., and the northwest corner of the State, to connect with the oblique arc along the Blue Ridge, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 577, to increase the appropriation "for continuing an exact line of levels from the Gulf to the transcontinental line of levels between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and for continuing the transcontinental line of levels," from $1,000 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 600, to increase the appropriation "for continuing explorations in the waters of Alaska, and making hydrographic surveys in the same" from $4,000 to $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "For," in line 602, to strike out the words "traveling expenses of officers and men of the Navy on duty, and for any;" so as to read:

For special surveys that may be required by the Light-House Board or other proper authority, and contingent expenses incident thereto.

Mr. ALLISON. That and the following amendment in the same clause should be disagreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why? I should like to have it explained.

Mr. ALLISON. The House provision is the correct one. This is to cover traveling expenses of naval officers who are connected with the survey and who travel from one position to another, and it is the only method whereby they can be paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is very forcible, but I see on line 523 an amendment striking out a similar clause was agreed to. I do not see the distinction.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a very wide distinction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will explain it.

Mr. ALLISON. On line 523 the words stricken out were intended to limit the subsistence of officers to a certain amount, $2 per day. They now receive, under the Treasury regulations, $3 per day; and the committee did not think it wise to disturb that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But striking it out does not seem to make any provision for their traveling expenses at all. In this appropriation for the Coast and Geodetic Survey you strike out the words "including traveling expenses," which is distinct from the limit of $2 per day——

Mr. ALLISON. But the Treasury regulations, which are referred to above, cover all these items. It is not necessary to repeat them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the committee is sure of it, very well.

Mr. ALLISON. The provision just above is in conformity with the regulations for the government of the Coast and Geodetic Survey adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Those are specific things well understood. I will say that the accounting officers have decided that officers of the Navy assigned to the Coast Survey can not receive traveling pay as they can while on duty in the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause after the word "thereto," in line 605, to insert "including traveling expenses of officers and men of the Navy on such duty."

Mr. ALLISON. That ought not to be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the end of the same clause, in line 605, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For traveling expenses of officers and men of the Navy on duty, and for any special surveys that may be required by the Light-House Board or other proper authority, and contingent expenses incident thereto, $5,000.

The next amendment was, in line 609, to increase the appropriation "for continuing tide observations on the Pacific coast" from $2,000 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 610, to increase the appropriation "for magnetic observations on the Pacific coast" from $1,000 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 611, to insert:

For traveling expenses of the superintendent and his party on duty of inspection, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 615, to increase the appropriation "for objects not hereinbefore named that may be deemed urgent" from $1,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 618, to increase the total amount of the appropriation "for party expenses of Coast and Geodetic Survey" from $95,300 to $125,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 619, to insert:

For furnishing points for State surveys, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 627, to insert:

For continuing physical hydrography of New York Bay and Harbor, including East River to Throg's Neck, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "pay of field officers," Coast and Geodetic Survey, to strike out from line 639 to line 664, inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert from line 665 to line 707, inclusive.

Mr. HALE. Let that be treated as one amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The striking out and insertion of a long list there should be treated as one amendment. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations found a very considerable reduction of the number of officials here and also a considerable change in the pay, some increased and some reduced, and the committee have carefully examined the whole subject and inserted the number and pay allowed in last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without any change?

Mr. ALLISON. Without any change as to number or as to pay.

Mr. HALE. With the proviso on page 30.

Mr. ALLISON. That provides that when vacancies occur there shall be no new appointments until the number of assistants, &c., is reduced to fifty-two, the number now being sixty-one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, after line 638, to strike out the following:

For pay of the Superintendent, $6,000.
For pay of three assistants, at $3,500 per annum each, $10,500.
For pay of three assistants, at $2,500 per annum each, $7,500.
For pay of five assistants, at $2,250 per annum each, $11,250.
For pay of four assistants, at $2,000 per annum each, $8,000.
For pay of six assistants, at $1,800 per annum each, $10,800.
For pay of eight assistants, at $1,500 per annum each, $12,000.
For pay of two assistants, at $1,400, $2,800.
For pay of five assistants, at $1,200 per annum each, $6,000.
For pay of twelve aids, at $900 per annum each, $10,800.
Total pay in field, $85,650.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay of Superintendent, $6,000.
For pay of two assistants, at $4,000 per annum, $8,000.
For pay of one assistant, at $3,600 per annum.
For pay of one assistant, at $3,200.
For pay of two assistants, at $3,000 per annum, $6,000.
For pay of two assistants, at $2,800 per annum, $5,600.
For pay of four assistants, at $2,400 per annum, $9,600.
For pay of three assistants, at $2,300 per annum, $6,900.
For pay of six assistants, at $2,200 per annum, $13,200.
For pay of six assistants, at $2,000 per annum, $12,000.
For pay of ten assistants, at $1,800 per annum, $18,000.
For pay of nine assistants, at $1,500 per annum, $13,500.
For pay of three subassistants, at $1,400 per annum, $4,200.
For pay of two subassistants, at $1,300 per annum, $2,600.
For pay of four subassistants, at $1,100 per annum, $4,400.
For pay of six aids, at $900 per annum, $5,400.
For pay of one aid, at $720 per annum.
Total pay in field, $123,120: Provided, That no new appointments shall be made to the above force until the whole number of assistants, subassistants, and aids shall be reduced to fifty-two.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 671 I will add the words "per annum;" so that the clause will read:

For pay of one assistant, at $3,200 per annum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And those words should be added in line 665, "For pay of Superintendent, $6,000," as well, to make it harmonious.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that that is necessary, but it may as well be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that the same rule prevails from line 709 to line 809, inclusive, and then from line 810 to 984. I wish that to be treated as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Under the head of "Pay of office force, Coast and Geodetic Survey," it is proposed to strike out from line 709 to line 809, inclusive, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On line 1004 I ask consent to offer an amendment. "Twenty-eight thousand five hundred dollars" should be struck out as the total amount of the appropriation for general expenses of the office of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and "$30,000" inserted, to make the totals correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that correction will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1017, after the words "publishing observations," to strike out:

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that amendment may be passed over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to strike out the word "journey," in line 1230, and insert the word "voyage."

Mr. ALLISON. I did not know but they might want to go across some canal. [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire how much balance there is unexpended that is put at the command of the President respecting the prevention of epidemics?

Mr. ALLISON. The amount is $275,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has plenty then.

Mr. GIBSON. I have an amendment to offer at that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that an amendment is not in order until the committee amendments have been disposed of.

The next amendment was, after line 1354, to insert:

The next amendment was to strike out the clause from line 1364 to line 1377, inclusive; as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend from any balance of the appropriation for "Contingent expenses office of the Secretary of the Interior," and so forth, for the fiscal year 1886, that may not be required for other purposes or remain unexpended, not, however, to exceed $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the introduction in the Interior Department building of an electric-light plant, including dynamos, engines, boilers, pumps, wires, lamps, and such other material, and also labor, as may be required for the introduction of said plant; and the said sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made available for the purposes herein specified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1379, after the word "building," to strike out:

For occupancy by the Pension Office, the General Land Office, Indian Office, Bureau of Education, Office of the Commissioner of Railroads, Bureau of Labor, the office of the agent for the payment of pensions in the District of Columbia, and Office of the Geological Survey, namely: For extending the fourth floor around the whole building, to extend the wrought-iron gallery, and to provide light, heat, and ventilation for the new fourth-story rooms, for record-rooms, and for clerical work, $61,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. It would strike one who did not know so much about this subject as the Committee on Appropriations that this was a very reasonable provision of the bill, so that the already overcrowded buildings in the Interior Department may be relieved. I should like to hear the objections to it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will observe that we do propose to complete the building by the remaining portion of this paragraph, but not to enlarge it The proposition just read is a provision to build another story on the Pension building, and it so appears on its face, to make a fourth story. It is in fact a proposition to cut the third story in two, and make a story above the present third story, which will be lighted from the roof by little circular holes just under the roof. It is perfectly manifest, it seems to me, that such a place would be uninhabitable during a portion of the year at least in this city.

Mr. HALE. Would it not be exactly as if the top of this Chamber was cut off and another story made around the lower part of the gallery?

Mr. ALLISON. It would be, I think, a great deal worse than that, if anything could be worse.

Mr. HALE. But that is the idea.

Mr. ALLISON. And therefore the committee believed, after a thorough examination so far as they could make an examination, that this scheme was wholly impracticable, and the Secretary of the Interior, after very careful examination, coincided with us.

The third story of this building ought to be utilized as a hall of records, when we get it finally completed. It is a story 31 feet high, with a circuit of windows around it, and it can be utilized for public records because it is a fire-proof building. The committee think it would be a waste of money to put another story there with a view to having it occupied by a clerical force.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is it 31 feet high?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the height the architect thought necessary to give the building the beautiful appearance it now has. I submit to the Senate that it would not be wise to divide this story into two parts in the way proposed.

Mr. HALE. I hope that no Senator will ask any questions about that remarkable and wonderful monstrosity that stands on the north side of Judiciary Square known as the new Pension Office building. The ingenuity of man, that has heretofore been devoted to the erection of structures that offend the eye and result in a total failure in almost every particular, has never gone as far as has been done in this building as it stands to-day before our eyes. It is a reproach in every way. It is unsightly and inconvenient. The room in it is wasted, and it is a total and complete abortion and failure. The less that is said about it the better.

Mr. HAWLEY. And it has no right to be on Judiciary Square.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 1395, to strike out:

In all, $150,000. And as soon as completed as herein provided for the Secretary of the Interior shall, within the fiscal year 1887, cause to be removed to the said building the General Land Office, Indian Office, Bureau of Education, Office of Commissioner of Railroads, Bureau of Labor, and the office of the agent for the payment of pensions in the District of Columbia, and office of the Geological Survey, and vacate the buildings rented for and now occupied by said offices and bureaus, or portions thereof; and the said Pension Office building shall be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior and subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

So as to make the clause read:

Pension building: For completing the Pension office building, renewing roof covering injured during construction of superstructure, and painting inside and out, plastering and decorating walls of hall and office rooms, wood flooring in office-rooms, tiling and other pavements, vault lights, hall and cellars, sky-lights, ventilating towers, entrance gate and gateways, supervision, foremen, superintendent, office expenses, and contingencies, $89,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the words "Capitol terraces," in line 1416, to strike out:

For continuing the work upon the terraces of the Capitol, sections marked K, D, and J, as shown on printed plan accompanying the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury (Executive Document No. 9, first session Forty-eighth Congress), including wages of mechanics and laborers, and for reconstructing boiler-vaults connected with sections C and K, $150,000.

That the unexpended balance of the appropriation for continuing the construction of the terrace and grand stairways of the Capitol made in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," is hereby reappropriated or rendered available for the continuation of that work during the fiscal year 1887.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

All work upon the Capitol terraces shall be suspended till a further plan shall be submitted to Congress providing for committee-rooms upon the western front of said terraces, with proper ventilation and light from windows in the outer western wall.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that we have this document I hold in my hand printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection.

Mr. SEWELL. What document is that?

Mr. VEST. Mr. Olmsted's letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. If it was before the Committee on Appropriations I want it read to show how weak a case it makes.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. Yes; let it be printed where it will be seen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The paper is as follows:

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman of Committee of Appropriations,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I respectfully ask that the attention of your committee may be invited to certain considerations affecting the question of opening windows in the outer wall of the terrace of the Capitol.

The essential purpose of the Capitol is provided for in a range of halls for legislative assemblies with connecting corridors, ante-rooms, and side rooms, and this range is manifested exteriorly by colonnades and other decorative features carried around the entire building. It is set well above ground, and is held up and made more conspicuous and notable by a very plain basement story.

Below this basement story there are foundation walls, and between these foundation walls a cellar. It is not customary in buildings of any importance to make a show of the foundation walls or of the cellar. It would detract from the dignity of such buildings to do so. That the cellar may be lighted and ventilated it is usual to make what in common city buildings is called an area, within which windows are opened through the foundation walls into the cellar in such a manner that they can not be seen in a general view of the building from the outside.

This is essentially what has been done in building the Capitol, the area on the west side being a very large one. There are rooms of some importance in the cellar story, but these rooms are not designed to be presented to view, nor can they be presented to view with propriety any more than the coal vaults or any domestic offices in the cellar of ordinary fine, large town houses.

The original design of the Capitol has thus been sufficiently explained. Now, as to the construction that is being added to it, called the terrace, it must not be supposed that this has been designed with the slightest idea of amending or reorganizing or overruling the original design of the building. It has not been intended to make a more important feature of the cellar part of the building, to bring it out of ground or to light it. Had there been any such purpose, had Congress asked for a plan for any such purpose, a very different plan would have been devised for it from that of the terrace. Nothing whatever of what has thus far been built of the terrace would have been proposed.

What, then, was the object of the terrace? The answer may be given in this way:

Here is a great and costly building, the greater part of the cost of which has been directed to the purpose of producing a certain impression on the minds of those looking toward it, and an impression that should be associated with ideas of the strength and majesty of a great nation.

There is nothing more necessary to a successful realization of such a purpose in a building than that it should seem to stand firmly; that its base should seem to be immovable. There is a difficulty in making as strong an impression in this respect as is desirable when an extraordinarily massive structure is placed, as in the case of the Capitol, hanging upon the brow of a hill.

The object of the terrace was to more effectually overcome this difficulty. How was it to be accomplished?

It was proposed to be accomplished by setting a strong wall into the face of the hill in front of the foundations of the building; that is to say, in front of its cellar walls. Such an outer wall, it was calculated, would have the effect upon the eye of a dam holding back whatever on its upper side looked liable to settle toward the down-hill side. Every dollar thus far spent on the terrace, and on the grounds in connection with it, has been spent on the supposition that this calculation was soundly made. If it was soundly made, then it will appear that the opening of holes in this wall would leave the same effect as the opening of holes in a dam. It would make the building behind it look less secure in its foundations, less firmly based on the down-hill side.

Another way of stating the intended effect of the wall is that it would seem to overcome all tendency of the upper part of the hill to be squeezed out by the weight of the great mass of masonry above it.

Now, such a wall being seen a short distance in front of the cellar wall of the Capitol, it is of no consequence, with reference to the purpose stated, whether the space between the two is occupied by solid earth, or whether the earth is excavated, and in its place cross-walls built, by which any tendency of the cellar walls to slip out would be resisted. The result must be the same, a firmly reinforced base. In this case the arrangement of cross-walls has been adopted, and it has been thought that an advantage would be gained by making the spaces between these cross walls available for storage vaults, and in those parts where, under the old arrangement, a sunken area had been provided for the lighting of the cellar of the main building, that the spaces so gained should be prepared in a manner making them equally suitable with the best of the present cellar rooms in respect to the requirements of light and air. But the advantages to be gained in this way have always during the ten years in which the scheme has been under discussion been presented as incidental advantages simply, not as the main purpose.

With reference to this incidental purpose, and more specially to the requirement of additional committee-rooms, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was asked to say how many additional well-lighted and ventilated rooms were desirable. The answer was that twenty would be enough. As the plan stands now, twenty-eight rooms are provided for. Their average area is 25 by 15 feet. Each has at least one window opening upon the area, and the smallest of these windows measures 8 by 11 feet. There is a large door opposite the window of each room opening from a spacious corridor, through which a thorough draught can be carried. The rooms would be large, lofty, airy, and well lighted.

Respectfully,

FRED'K LAW OLMSTED,
Landscape Architect.

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1886.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriation was, under the head of "Hot Springs Improvement," in line 1444, after the word "for," to strike out "continuation" and insert "completion;" so as to make the clause read:

For completion of improvement of Hot Springs Creek, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1463, after the word "lands," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $60,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I asked that lines 1462 to 1467, inclusive, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments in those lines will be passed over without action, if there be no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1476, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" and in line 1481, after the word "exceeding," strike out "two dollars and fifty cents" and insert "three dollars;" so as to read:

Settlement of claims for swamp land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp lands and for indemnity for swamp lands, $20,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "depredations on public timber" and "protecting public lands," while travelling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1487, after the word "same," to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

Reproducing plats of surveys: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to continue to reproduce worn and defaced official plats of surveys on file, and other plats constituting a part of the records of said office, and also to furnish local land officers with the same, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1493, to insert the word "of" before the words "the sum;" after the word "appropriated," at the end of the same line, to strike out "as far" and insert "$10,000, or so much thereof;" in line 1496, after the word "field," to insert "made under this appropriation;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveying the public lands, $50,000, at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $7 for township, and $5 for section lines; and of the sum hereby appropriated, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended for the examination of surveys in the field made under this appropriation, to test the accuracy of the work and to prevent payment for fraudulent and imperfect surveys returned by deputy surveyors, and inspecting mineral deposits, coal-fields, swamp-lands, and timber districts, and for making such other surveys or examinations as may be required for identification of lands for purposes of evidence in any suit or proceeding in behalf of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that lines 1489 to 1503, inclusive, be passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was just going to ask that myself; and I want to give notice of an amendment which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. I shall move at the proper time at the end of line 1488, on page 61, to insert these words:

And the moneys received at the General Land Office as fees for furnishing transcripts of records and patents, shall be deposited in the Treasury and be deemed an appropriation to pay for making such copies; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be authorized to use any portion of this appropriation for piecework or for temporary clerk-hire, by the day, month, or year, at such rate or rates as he may deem just and fair, not exceeding a thousand dollars a year.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1503, to insert:

For surveying the public lands in the State of Nevada, $30,000, at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $7 for township, and $5 for section lines, except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow, for the survey of standard and meander lines through lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, a sum not exceeding $13 per linear mile for standard lines, $11 for township, and $7 for section lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the provision in line 1490, appropriating $50,000 "for surveying the public lands," is the sum total of the appropriations for surveys of the public lands, except the special appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. It is, but that amendment has been passed over for further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1522, after the word "for," to strike out "necessary expenses of survey, appraisal, sale, and pay of custodians" and insert "care and preservation;" and in line 1527, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

For care and preservation of abandoned military reservations transferred to the control of the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 5, 1884, $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the clause from line 1522 to 1527, inclusive, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments in that part of the bill will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1527, to insert:

For the survey of the grant known as the Hanson grant, in the State of Florida, $400, the said sum to be expended under the direction and discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend that by putting before the word "grant" the word "alleged." I have been trying to look that matter up in the records of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and I am not absolutely sure that there is any such valid grant, and I do not want any implication that there is. I want to put the word "alleged" before "grant," in line 1528; so as to read:

For the survey of the alleged grant known as the Hanson grant, in the State of Florida, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1533, after the words "protection and improvement of the Yellowstone National Park," to strike out:

For the construction and improvement of suitable roads and bridges within the park, under the supervision and direction of an engineer officer detailed by the Secretary of War for that purpose, $20,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For every purpose and object necessary for the protection, preservation, and improvement of the Yellowstone National Park, including compensation of superintendent and employés, $40,000; $2,000 of said amount to be paid annually to a superintendent of said park, and not exceeding $900 annually to each of ten assistants, all of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and reside continuously in the park, and whose duty it shall be to protect the game, timber, and objects of interest therein; the balance of the sum appropriated to be expended in the construction and improvement of suitable roads and bridges within said park, under the supervision and direction of an engineer officer detailed by the Secretary of War for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Is the effect of that language to make a permanent appropriation?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; it is not so intended.

Mr. VEST. That is the language of the former appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. Forty thousand dollars is the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. But the language is "$2,000 of said amount to be paid annually to a superintendent." Does not that involve a continued appropriation of a particular amount to be paid annually? If you said "$2,000 per annum to be paid to the superintendent" it would not be, but you say "to be paid annually."

Mr. ALLISON. I accept the criticism of the Senator from Massachusetts, and move to insert the words "per annum" instead of "annually" where the word "annually" twice occurs in that clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, to strike out "annually" and insert "per annum" in line 1541.

Mr. HOAR. That would be the same thing. Strike out the words "of said amount to be paid annually" and put in "$2,000 per annum."

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I proposed.

Mr. EVARTS. Would not this be the proper amendment:

Two thousand dollars of said amount to be paid as a year's compensation for a superintendent of said park.

Mr. HALE. Or "for the fiscal year."

Mr. ALLISON. If Senators will agree on it I shall be satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1541, after the word "paid," it is proposed to strike out "annually" and insert "as a year's compensation."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Line 1543 ought to be amended in the same way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The change will be made there if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 1585, to the close of the provision relating to the United States Geological Survey.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that here is a poor, forlorn branch of the Government that seems to have no friends in either House; nobody has even offered an amendment for it; and that it be allowed to go over until to-morrow. The Geological Survey nobody seems to take any interest in, and no amendments have been offered. I think it had better go over.

Mr. ALLISON. You mean the amendments we propose?

Mr. HALE. I ask that they go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment beginning on line 1586?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir, the whole part of the bill in regard to the Geological Survey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the amendments to that part of the bill will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "miscellaneous objects," in the appropriations for "Government Hospital for the Insane," after line 1619, to insert:

For the erection of a hospital building for convict and homicidal insane, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb," in line 1627, after the word "improvements," to strike out the words "fifty-two thousand five hundred" and to insert "fifty-five thousand;" in line 1628, after the word "than," to strike out the words "twenty-five thousand" and insert the words "twenty-six thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Current expenses of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: For support of the institution, including salaries and incidental expenses, and for books and illustrative apparatus, for general repairs, and improvements, $55,000: Provided, That no more than $26,500 of said sum shall be expended for salaries and wages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1640, after the word "building," to strike out the word "five" and insert the word "eight;" so that the clause will read:

For the extension of the buildings of the institution for the purpose of providing additional school-room accommodation, and also room for the instruction of the pupils in industrial labor, and for furnishing and fitting up said additional building, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum," in line 1654, after the word "surgeon-in-chief," to insert the words "not to exceed $3,000;" in line 1665, after the word "mangle," to strike out the words "two hundred" and to insert "three hundred and twenty-five;" in line 1667, after the word "hundred," to insert the words "and fifty;" and in the same line, after the word "thousand," to strike out the words "four hundred" and insert "five hundred and seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For subsistence, $22,000; for salaries and compensation of the surgeon-in-chief, not to exceed $3,000, two assistant surgeons, engineer, clerk, matron, nurses, laundresses, cooks, teamsters, watchmen, and laborers, $13,600; for rent of hospital buildings and grounds, $4,000; for fuel and light, clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, medicines and medical supplies, repairs and furniture, and other absolutely necessary expenses, $10,500; erecting one two-story building, to be used as bath-rooms and water-closets for wards 1 and 2, $900; one mangle, $325; two washing-machines, $850; in all, $52,575.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1672, after the word "Museum," to strike out the word "building;" so as make the clause read:

Heating and lighting the National Museum: For expense of heating, lighting, and electrical and telephonic service for the National Museum, $11,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. Is this the appropriate time to call for an explanation in relation to the expenditures for the National Museum as connected with the Smithsonian Institution? I have yet to know under what committee of the Senate these expenditures are arranged. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether any committee of the Senate has any jurisdiction over these expenditures? Here is a large appropriation of $106,500.

For the preservation, exhibition, and increase of the collections received from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, and from other sources, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employés.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that any special committee has charge of these expenditures, unless it be the Committee on Appropriations. They are very carefully estimated for in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. SEWELL. The National Museum and Smithsonian Institution seem to report their proceeding directly to the Committee on Appropriations, and their appropriations are granted as estimated for in that way without going through any committee of the Senate, as all other expenses of the Government do.

Mr. HALE. What committees do the salaries of the employés of the Departments come under in any case except the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SEWELL. They come regularly to the Committee on Appropriations, but the interests of the Treasury Department are in charge of the Finance Committee.

Mr. HALE. The Finance Committee do not deal with the salaries of employés.

Mr. SEWELL. But here is a lump sum for the preservation, exhibition, and increase of collections in the National Museum amounting to $106,500.

Mr. HALE. It is the same as the Fish Commission.

Mr. SEWELL. I grant the Fish Commission is of the same character.

Mr. HALE. There are thirty other items in the bill of the same kind.

Mr. SEWELL. There are very few others, if any. There is a Committee on Fisheries of the Senate to-day that has not a particle of control over the expenditures of the Fish Commission, as it ought to have.

Mr. ALLISON. So far as the National Museum is concerned, for the number of employés and the character of work done the compensation of the persons who perform the work is less than in any other department of this Government. They are employed at very small compensation and are generally highly intelligent and educated men.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not find any fault with the compensation or with the intelligence of the gentlemen employed in those bureaus. I merely criticise the mode of doing business. Take the Army matters; they are referred to the Military Committee, and naval matters to the Naval Committee, and finance matters to the Committee on Finance. It seems that the Smithsonian Institution, the Fish Commission, and the National Museum deal directly with the Committee on Appropriations, without supervision on the part of any other committee.

Mr. ALLISON. The Smithsonian Institution is not a Government institution. It is controlled by regents appointed, two by the President of the Senate and two by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the others are ex officio members; and the expenditures of the Smithsonian Institution are not even under the control of Congress, I think. The Smithsonian fund is perpetually in the Treasury, drawing a fixed rate of interest, and the income is under the control of the regents.

Mr. SEWELL. Does the chairman of the Appropriations Committee say that no appropriation is made for the Smithsonian Institution?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not.

Mr. SEWELL. Are none of the officers' salaries paid by Congress?

Mr. ALLISON. Not that I know of.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that it might be very well at the beginning of the next session of Congress to have a slight amendment to the rules by which all questions relating to the National Museum and the Smithsonian Institution, and perhaps some kindred matters, so far as a change in their work is proposed, should be referred to the Committee on the Library. But I do not say that that would justify the present criticism, because I suppose that committee would no more look into the question of the number of clerks to carry out the ordinary work than the Committee on the Judiciary would look into the same question in regard to the Department of Justice.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that

I did not intend to make any criticism at the present time; but at some future time I shall ask that matters in relation to the National Museum and also the Fish Commission shall be referred to or placed under the jurisdiction of the appropriate committees of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. That would require a change of the rules.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from New Jersey desires that some other committee shall overhaul these bureaus in respect to their appropriations, of course I have no objection to that. If the Committee on Appropriations have not carefully scrutinized the amounts of these appropriations, I trust the Senator will point out where the committee has been negligent.

Mr. SEWELL. I did not intend to make any reflection of that kind. In the end we all have confidence in the Committee on Appropriations for running the Government, but I did intend to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these bureaus were being run without any supervision by a committee of Congress. I shall take occasion hereafter to bring the matter before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the indulgence of the chairman of the committee to introduce an amendment to this bill to be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be received and so referred.

Mr. EVARTS. I offer an amendment to this bill, to come in after line 1349, in connection with the control of Bedloe's Island, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. VEST. I submit an amendment to this bill to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1684, to insert:

Growth of Industrial Art:

That the provision of the act of March 3, 1885, authorizing the reproduction of the Growth of Industrial Art, hertofore prepared by and under the supervision of Benjamin Butterworth, be modified and amended to the extent and as herein provided; that the said Growth of Industrial Art may be reproduced of a size not less than 13 by 17 inches, and bound in one volume. Such reproduction shall be under the direction or supervision of the said Benjamin Butterworth, and he is authorized to add any additional statistics and historical matter which may have been prepared for said work, provided the same can be done and the entire cost of such reproduction, including the binding, which shall be done by the Public Printer, shall not exceed the amount heretofore set apart and designated for that purpose by the aforesaid act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that explained.

Mr. ALLISON. This is a matter already provided for in the act of March 3, 1885, and it is proposed to reduce the size of these illustrations and to print them in one volume instead of two. We have in our committee-room illustrations of the system.

Mr. TELLER. Congress made an appropriation for the Interior Department to make an exhibit at New Orleans. The then Commissioner of Patents gathered what he called a "growth of industrial art," showing the various improvements in all kinds of machinery. Taking for an illustration the machinery for cutting grass and grain, he started in the upper corner of a large volume with a man with a scythe mowing grass. Then the next machine that was patented for the cutting of grass and grain, which was a crude affair, followed, and so on down to the improved harvesters and binders, and the same with the printing-press and various other things.

It is one of the most interesting publications that can be imagined. It shows all the industrial art growth in this country, as exemplified by the patents in the Patent Office. Ten thousand dollars, I think, is the appropriation to duplicate a large number of them. I do not remember the expense that the Department went to. The work attracted a great deal of attention at New Orleans, not only from the people of this country but from foreigners. It is the most complete exhibit of the growth of this country, with all the statistics added, that can be made; and there is nothing, I think, that would go so far to give the people a ready and comprehensive idea of the growth of industrial art in this country as the publication of this work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Under the War Department," in the appropriations for armories and arsenals," in line 1717, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For general care, preservation, and improvement; for building new roads; for care and preservation of the water-power; for painting and care and preservation of permanent buildings, bridges, and shores of the island; for building fences, grading grounds, and repairs and extension of railroad, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to submit an amendment to this bill to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for Springfield arsenal, Springfield, Mass., after line 1727, to insert:

For construction of a fire-proof building to be used as a milling-shop, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., after line 1739, to insert:

For building a boiler-house, dry-house, and coal-shed, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "buildings and grounds in and around Washington," in line 1818, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

To be expended under the direction of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government.

So as to make the clause read:

For care, repair, and refurnishing the Executive Mansion, $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out the clause from line 1861 to line 1869 inclusive, as follows:

Washington Monument: For completion of the Washington Monument, namely: For earth filling and grading around the monument, filling pond just north of monument, office expenses, including rent of necessary office rooms, and for each and every purpose connected with the completion of the monument, $57,000, to be expended under the direction of the joint commission created by the act of August 2, 1876.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why do you strike that out?

Mr. ALLISON. I think we have made substantial progress to-night. It is now 11 o'clock, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 21, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 20, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a question of personal privilege. I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk the paragraph in the RECORD which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. President, as I said, I did not invite this controversy; I did not make any reference to the Senator from New York; but if he desires or thinks it advisable in a matter of this kind to pursue this subject upon personal grounds, he will find that I never decline the invitation. I say that a more shameful spectacle was never presented to the American people than this measure supported in the other House under the leadership of the chairman of a committee who is himself engaged in the dairy business, who has a herd and a farm whose product he sells in the market and upon which he relies for his support, and re-enforced in this body by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who is engaged in the same business, and who is to profit, if this bill can by any means whatever be passed through this body, directly by the legislation that he is seeking here to promote.

We have heard, Mr. President, something about attorneys at law in this body not being permitted to take fees against the Government of the United States in cases where land-grant railroads were involved; and the impropriety and the indecency of a member of this body availing himself of his position to take fees and swell his income as an attorney at law against the interests of the United States have been dwelt upon, and dwelt upon properly. But, sir, if that is improper, how much more improper is it, how much more indefensible is it, for the chairmen of the committees of the two Houses to present measures here in which they have direct personal interest, and whenever any argument is made against them to descend into the arena of vulgar personality and denunciation in order to make the passage of the measure less obnoxious.

Mr. HATCH. Every gentleman upon this floor will agree with me that this reference to myself as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives by a Senator in the discussion of a bill that passed this House is a violation of every parliamentary rule as well as of every manly and decent instinct that ought to actuate a member of either House. The respect I have for this House and its members alone deters me from characterizing this attack as it ought to be characterized.

I simply desire to say, when this gentleman connects my name with that of the Senator from New York, who was present, had the rights and privileges of the floor of the Senate, and could defend himself—when he seeks to connect my name with that of the Senator from New York in the statement that I am personally interested in the passage of that bill, or that I derive my support or any part of it from the product of a herd of cows upon my farm, it is simply a complete and gratuitous falsehood. There is no truth in it, and no foundation for it.

As a farmer, I am the owner of a little herd of Jersey cows that I raise for the profit of the increase, and I would be proud of owning a dairy farm in the State of Missouri and of being a dairy farmer. I wish I had had the good fortune to have saved enough in my past life to have been classed among the dairy farmers of Missouri. But when the gentleman attempts in my absence to insinuate, and in a forum where I have no rights, that I have any more personal interest in the passage of that bill than the ten millions of farmers and sixty millions of consumers of butter in the United States, he simply utters a falsehood. And when the gentleman goes further, and says I have in any part of this discussion descended into the arena of vulgar personality and denunciation, he utters the greatest falsehood of his life; and that is the hardest thing I can say about him. I have never on this floor descended, and I am not in the habit of descending, to personality and vulgarity. I leave that to flow from the mouth of the Senator from Kansas, "that teeming gangrened womb of slander and detraction."

HOUSE BILLS WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following House bills with Senate amendments; which were referred as indicated:

The bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The bill (H. R. 5003) for the relief of Mary E. Casey—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of the general-service clerks and general-service messengers in the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BRIDGES OVER THE TENNESSEE AND THE CUMBERLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2800) to authorize the construction of bridges over the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers by the Ohio Valley Railway Company.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee has reported a bill similar to that, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be now considered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Ohio Valley Railway Company, organized under act of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain bridges, and approaches thereto, over the Tennessee River at any point below Aurora, in the State of Kentucky, and the Cumberland River at any point below Canton, on said river. Said bridges shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporation by which they may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridges shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon the payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridges and the several railroad companies, or any of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridges, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 4. That any bridges authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said rivers as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridges, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the rivers, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridges are approved by the Secretary of War the bridges shall not be built, and should any change be made in the plan of said bridges during the progress of construction, such changes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONERS ON THE ROLL BY SPECIAL ACTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior in response to a resolution of the House stating the number of original pensioners on the pension-rolls placed there by special act; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will consent that that statement may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, July 12, 1886.

SIR: In response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, under date of the 22d ultimo, requesting information as to the number of persons now drawing original pensions from the Government of the United States by reason of special acts passed in their behalf and the amount of money required annually to meet the obligations incurred by the Government to this class of pensioners, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, dated the 10th instant, containing the desired information.

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, July 19, 1886.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 17th instant I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the letter of this Department, dated the 12th instant, and the inclosure therein referred to, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives calling for the number of special-act pensioners and the amount required to pay such pensions.

Very respectfully,

H. L. MULDROW, Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE.
Washington, July 10, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated June 22, 1886, which was referred to me for report by Department reference of the 23d ultimo, as to the number of persons now drawing original pensions from the Government of the United States, by reason of special pension acts passed in their behalf, and what amount of money is required annually to meet the obligations incurred by the Government to this class of pensioners.

A careful examination of the records of the various pension agencies shows that there are now upon the pension-rolls one thousand four hundred and seventy-four persons by virtue of special acts passed in their favor, and that there is required to pay said pensioners the sum of $359,395.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

TRUST FUNDS IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House, furnishing a full and complete schedule of all trust funds held by the chiefs of bureaus in the Department of the Interior; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD C. RIDGWAY & CO.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asked the other day to have the Senate bill (S. 1839), an act for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway & Co., put upon its passage, and the bill was read, after which objection was made. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] called for the regular order. If the objection is not insisted upon, the Chair now desires to dispose of the bill in some way.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I called for the regular order at that time merely for the purpose of getting at the regular business. I did not wish to stand in the way of the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? If not, the question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time, unless some gentleman desires to have it again read in full.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to the third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled the bill (H. R. 8023) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the municipalities of Menominee, Mich., and Marinette, Wis., over Menominee River; when the Speaker signed the same.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in, and that the House ask a conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to have those amendments read?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, let us have them read.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, this is the unanimous report of the committee. There are quite a number of amendments, in several of which we shall probably ask the House to concur; but the committee think it desirable to have a conference with the Senate conferees in order to ascertain what their views are.

The amendments were read.

Mr. HERBERT. By instruction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. It occurs to me that at this stage of the session it might be advisable that the amendments be considered in detail upon their merits by the Committee on Naval Affairs and by the House.

Mr. HERBERT. I am satisfied we can arrive at a conclusion much more readily in the manner proposed by the committee. As to quite a number of these amendments the Committee on Naval Affairs would doubtless concur; but we think it desirable, in order to expedite business, that there be a consultation with conferees on the part of the Senate as early as possible, in order to ascertain the motives with which some of these amendments were adopted. I hope therefore the House will non-concur.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are some of those amendments—3, 5, 11, 22, and several others—which I think ought to be concurred in. But I will waive the point.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and ask a conference with that body thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HERBERT, Mr. HEWITT, and Mr. HARMER as conferees on the part of the House.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a privileged question. By the unanimous instruction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I report back the bill known as the river and harbor appropriation bill, and ask that the House non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate and agree to the request of that body for a conference.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, should not these amendments receive their first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, if the point is raised.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make that point.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point. I will state to him that there are only seven or eight amendments of the Senate embracing new matter, the remainder consisting merely in scaling down matters which have been already fully considered in committee and in the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I understand the situation. I desire to make the point that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIS. But I am appealing to the gentleman to withdraw that point. Of course I know he understands the situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] insists on his point of order. Under the twentieth rule of the House these amendments must have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and the bill and amendments will be so referred.

Mr. WILLIS. I will call the matter up, then, as soon as possible.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 1730, with amendments, and that it be put on its passage.

Mr. HENLEY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DAVIS. This will take but a moment. I hope the gentleman will not insist. I think he will agree with me as to the importance of promptly passing this bill. It is in regard to the yellow fever commission.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California insist on the regular order?

Mr. HENLEY. I have no volition in the matter, because I am acting under the instructions of my committee.

RECIPROCITY CONVENTION WITH MEXICO.

Mr. HEWITT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back favorably a resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any correspondence, reports, or other information in possession of any Department or the Executive, relating to the probable advantages or disadvantages to accrue to the United States by the operation of the reciprocity commercial convention signed between the United States and Mexico on the 20th of January, 1883.

Mr. HEWITT. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report that the information which this resolution proposes to call for is deemed desirable, and the committee recommend the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon, which cuts off all requests for unanimous consent. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of general-service clerks and general-service messengers in the Army.

The SPEAKER. Do these amendments require that the bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. BRAGG. They do not.

The SPEAKER. The bill, with the amendments, will be referred to the House Calendar.

HENRY EAST.

GENERAL-SERVICE CLERKS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate to House bill 7191, to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers" in the Army, be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A MEMBER. I hope the demand for the regular order will be withdrawn.

Mr. HENLEY. I withdraw the demand for the regular order for a few moments.

Mr. PRICE. I renew the demand for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California proposed to make a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair perhaps misunderstood the gentleman from California. What was his statement?

Mr. HENLEY. I do not antagonize the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PRICE. I withdraw the demand for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] both withdraw the demand for the regular order, and the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] can now be considered.

Mr. BRAGG. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 7191) to provide for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of "general-service clerks" and "general-service messengers" in the Army.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. BRAGG. Unless some gentleman desires to hear the amendments in detail I think I can state their substance very briefly. The amendments of the Senate simply conform the bill to the provisions of the Army appropriation bill, in which the appropriation of the money has been already made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it increase or diminish the expenditure provided for in the law?

Mr. BRAGG. Neither.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES JUDGE FOR SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in and that the request of the Senate for a conference be agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the report be considered now.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker——

PUBLIC BUILDING, PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The report which was withdrawn?

Mr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with an amendment the bill (S. 86) to provide for the construction of a public building at Portland, Oreg.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, EAST SAGINAW, MICH.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1224, a bill (H. R. 9921) for the erection of a public building at East Saginaw, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the river and harbor appropriation bill with the Senate amendments thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the first section be considered as read. As a preliminary to that, I will call attention to the fact that there is but one amendment of the Senate in which, under the instructions of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I ask that the House non-concur.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to say that there is but one amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the report from the Senate. If the gentleman will refer to the bill he will find it stated:

July 16, 1886. Passed the Senate with an amendment.

That amendment consists in striking out the enacting clause and inserting matter in the form of a new bill. Now, I am instructed by the unanimous action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to ask that the House non-concur in that amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My recollection from an examination of the RECORD is that there were various amendments by the Senate increasing the amount of the bill some $2,000,000 or $3,000,000; and after these amendments had been separately acted on another amendment was adopted by which the aggregate amount of the bill as amended was reduced 25 per cent.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state to the gentleman that after that was done the Senate adopted one amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a new bill. Therefore the final action of the Senate was—

July 16, 1886. Passed the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But is it not true that this "amendment" adds many items which do not appear in the bill as it left the House?

Mr. WILLIS. There is no question about that; but the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is that the House non-concur.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is to say, you want us to vote on the one amendment covering about one hundred pages.

Mr. WILLIS. I shall be very much obliged if the House will do it. I think it will facilitate matters.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I should be very glad to consider these amendments in the ordinary way, in the hope that we might not reach the end of their consideration before Congress adjourns, so that the bill itself might ultimately fail.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not share that hope with the gentleman. For the purpose of raising the question, I move non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting certain new clauses and sections.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. We are now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this Senate amendment, and each paragraph of the amendment of the Senate is, as we reach it, open for consideration. The fact that the Senate adopts as a substitute for the House bill a measure containing a large number of paragraphs does not make the case different from what it would be if the Senate had simply amended each successive paragraph of the House bill. Here is an amendment sent from the House to the Senate, containing many paragraphs. Under the rule of the House these paragraphs are subject to consideration in the first place in Committee of the Whole. I submit that it is not in order to move to non-concur in all these amendments in a body, but each of them comes before the House separately for consideration. Each successive amendment may be concurred in or non-concurred in. For the purpose of raising the point more distinctly I call for a division of the question. That raises the question on each successive paragraph of the entire body of amendments.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But, Mr. Chairman, the House being in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this "amendment," must not the "amendment" be read?

The CHAIRMAN. Any member has the right to call for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is it not the regular order of proceeding without a call from any member? We are in Committee of the Whole; these amendments have not been read; the gentleman from Kentucky has asked to dispense with the reading. The Chair did not put that request for unanimous consent, and it has not been granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the request of the gentleman from Kentucky for unanimous consent, and did not put the request to the committee.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I submit the first thing in order is for the Clerk to read the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is recognized on the question of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the position of the gentleman from Indiana, that because the amendment embraces several items those items are to be treated as separate amendments, is not tenable. We have before us one amendment. When the necessary steps are taken to bring about a conference upon the bill before the House then the items of the amendment can be considered, but not now. No division of the question is admissible. There is but one question. A single amendment is presented; and the question is whether we shall concur or non-concur.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has asked for a division of the question. I call the attention of the Chair to page 333 of the Manual.

Mr. RANDALL. Not a division of the question, but a division of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. The amendment of the Senate is an entirety. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert certain words. I call the attention of the Chair to the decisions heretofore rendered. It has been decided that upon a Senate amendment no division of the question is admissible. The single amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert certain other clauses, making a new bill. This is sent here as an amendment, not as amendments. I grant that if the Senate had taken up each item of the House bill, one after another, and thus scaled it down or otherwise changed it, the motion of the gentleman from Indiana would have been in order. But the Senate, instead of doing that, has presented the amendment as an entirety—an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a new bill. It is this single amendment which the gentleman now asks to have divided.

Mr. RANDALL. Rule XX provides:

> Any amendment of the Senate to any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if, originating in the House, it would be subject to that point.

I maintain in obedience to that rule this bill has gone to the Committee of the Whole.

I maintain further, Mr. Chairman, it is susceptible of division, because it contains many separate and distinct propositions.

Several MEMBERS. And new ones.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; entirely distinct propositions and many new ones, any one of which, if the point of order is raised, would be sent to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its first consideration. It contains many propositions which never yet have been considered by the House or by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at all, and must, therefore, be open to division, to separate and distinct discussion, to amendment, to concurrence with amendment, or to concurrence or non-concurrence.

It is, Mr. Chairman, in all respects like an original bill coming here and subject to the rules of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would call the attention of the Chair to the Journal of the House, second session Thirty-second Congress, page 401:

> The Speaker having again stated the question to be on agreeing to the said amendment—
> Mr. Alexander H. Stephens asked a division of the question, so that a separate vote might be taken upon the different sections comprised in the amendment.
> The Speaker decided that the question was indivisible, and that the vote must be taken upon the entire amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Was not that in reference to the Kansas and Nebraska bill?

Mr. DIBBLE. No; it was a bill making appropriations for the naval service. That was the bill. Mr. Chairman, shall I proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. DIBBLE. The Speaker decided the question was indivisible, and the vote must be taken on the entire amendment. From this decision of the Chair an appeal was taken, and on motion of Mr. Dean the appeal was laid on the table.

The amendment consisted of several sections. It was the forty-second amendment of a bill providing for the reorganization of the Navy. I have only the Journal of the House before me, and therefore am not able at this moment to present the items in the various sections.

Mr. Alexander H. Stephens asked for a division, so that a separate vote might be taken upon the different sections comprised in the bill. It was precisely such a case as the present one. This amendment has several sections. The question was whether that could be divided, and the Speaker decided it was indivisible; that the vote must be taken on it as an entire amendment. It is a case exactly like this. I found it by reference to the Digest. I found it cited as one of the authorities in the last edition of the Rules and Digest.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to give the Chair the page of the Digest?

Mr. DIBELE. It is page 333. It is there cited as one of the authorities in reference to the division of questions. It is there cited as an authority against a division on a Senate amendment, Journal 2, 32, page 401.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is the information coming to us from the bill itself.

> Passed the Senate with an amendment July 16, 1886.
> Resolved, That the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendment.

The amendment is put in the singular number. Then we find the following:

> Ordered, That Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. RANSOM be the conferees on the part of the Senate.
> Attest:
> ANSON G. MCCOOK, Secretary.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield to me for a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. I will.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from South Carolina has cited a decision in 1853, at a time when the rule was not in existence which we now have requiring the Senate amendments to have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union just as an original bill would have to go to that committee. The gentleman's citation is not applicable, therefore, to the present case.

Mr. DIBBLE. The principle is precisely the same. The object of the conference which the Senate asks on this bill is not to defeat it but to facilitate legislation. The Senate have made an amendment to this bill. They have sent it here. They have asked for a conference on that amendment. Those who are hostile to this bill and do not desire to send it back at all and are willing that the great works of public improvement in this country shall not be carried on by the Government but left as they are—in effect, that all the money heretofore expended upon them shall be lost—of course those who are opposed to this and all like meritorious bills would naturally antagonize any mode for the purpose of bringing the two Houses into conference and agreement.

This bill, as the committee will remember, occupied a long time in its first discussion. The Senate amendment, while it strikes out the original bill and substitutes another bill, really contains only a few items of difference. The general substance of the bill is the same, and embodies the same general principle that is applicable to the House bill. Of course, as I have said, there are some few other items of change, but they are not such changes as require the House now at this stage of the session to go over again, as it has already done in the Committee of the Whole, this whole question. The rule is a salutary one. This very case is an illustration of its being a salutary rule. All the requirements of the rule of the House will have been complied with, and legislation will be furthered, and the interest of these great public improvements will be advanced by a decision in accordance with the precedents already had on this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, there is a cardinal principle in the construction of the rules of a parliamentary body which is sought to be violated by the assertion of this point of order. The principle to which I allude is that the rules of a parliamentary body shall be so construed as to carry the business of such body forward and not backward. This construction is in the interest of the dispatch of public business and not in the direction of the obstruction and defeat of business, and all doubtful questions ought to be construed by the Chair in the light of that principle.

Here it is sought, in support of this question of order, that the Chair shall insert language into this rule that is not already there. In opposition to this point of order it is claimed, upon the other side, that the Chair shall give only a literal construction to the language. Therefore we are asking a construction based upon the literal language without interpolation or addition when our construction is in the direction of progress and an intelligent solution of the pending question. They ask upon the other side for the introduction into this rule of language which is not there, but to be put there by the Chair by inference or by construction for the purpose of doing a vain thing, and for the purpose of making the rule an impedement rather than a facility to the transaction of business.

In the consideration of this rule of the House the Chair will look at the whole bill. This bill has been considered heretofore item by item in the House, excepting that it is said upon the other side that there are certain items which have been introduced into it by the Senate and which were not specifically, one by one and item by item, passed upon by the House in Committee of the Whole, as its rules require. Now, what have we before us? A single amendment to the bill. And it is said that the House ought not to be compelled to vote upon that single amendment to the bill because there are certain other items in that single amendment which change the whole attitude of the bill itself, and that while a member of the House might be willing to vote for the bill without the new item he would not be willing to vote for it with the new item, and therefore the House ought to be permitted at this stage of the bill to examine the items for the purpose of striking them out.

But this is not all their argument; it is only a part of it; and in point of fact that is not what they are claiming. They are claiming to go over the items one by one, not only those which have been inserted by the Senate as an amendment to the bill, but those which have already been passed upon by the House as well as by the Senate. Now, my proposition is that so far as there are new items in the bill they go to settle the question pro or con whether or not we will agree to the amendment of the Senate or refuse to agree to the amendment of the Senate; but that by no possibility of means affects the parliamentary question as to whether this is one or several amendments. Now, I will not claim to be as familiar with the rule as the gentlemen who make the point of order, and I would not be apt to put my judgment against theirs, for necessarily there is involved a history of the adoption of the rule, the construction which has been given to it and the scope of its applicability through the parliamentary proceedings of the House from time to time in years past, and on the ground of familiarity with the rule I would not undertake to argue the proposition; but in the light of the general principle involved I submit, as being a cardinal point, as being a canon of construction in all questions of this kind, that the business of parliamentary bodies is intended to be carried forward not backward, and there is no construction of this rule to justify the reconsideration of the items of this bill which have been already passed upon by the House.

Let us take a single item by way of illustration of this point. Take the item "A," for instance. It appropriated when it left the House $100,000 for a specific purpose. By the Senate amendment the appropriation is $75,000. Does anybody undertake to say that the original question shall be passed upon by the House again in Committee of the Whole because of this change? Most certainly not. Nobody would undertake to say that. We have passed forward, if the principle of parliamentary construction is to be held, to another stage. The bill has stages to it under the rules. We are not to go backward to retrace our steps, but constantly forward and meet the new aspect that is presented and that only.

I have no doubt in considering this question—that is to say, the question whether or not the House will agree to the Senate amendment or refuse to agree—that it would be perfectly competent to demand the reading of any item which makes up the amendment, which reading could be called for by any gentleman who desired to discuss, on that basis, the propriety or impropriety of concurrence in the light of that particular amendment to show if he could that the amendment would change the condition of the bill. But to undertake to say that here is not one amendment but a whole series of amendments, each of which must have separate consideration, would be ruling in the direction of restriction; it would be a retrograde movement in legislation; and in my humble judgment—for I can not fully illustrate the point—but in my humble judgment would tend to wholly defeat progress in the House of Representatives upon any one of these bills.

The other day there came back here not one amendment, not an amendment to strike out the entire bill and insert another, but a bill with two hundred and fifty-seven individual amendments. Nobody denied that each was a proper item of consideration, because it was independent and stood upon its own merits. It was but one step in the many changes made by the Senate to the House bill.

So my proposition is this, Mr. Chairman, that originally we have examined all the items that were in the House bill. The Senate takes the bill, and without seeking to amend any one of the items alone, makes a new bill, and submits it to the House in the form of an amendment; and the question whether it ought to be adopted or not turns upon the question as to how each individual item in the bill stands. I agree to that; but I think, in the interest of going forward and not backward, the Chair ought to rule it is one amendment and subject to the same question that could be made on a single item of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I see the Senate amendment has reduced the appropriation for improvements on the Wabash River from $80,000 to $60,000. That is an item which is in the original bill. Now, the Senate adds new features to this bill and inserts improvements that were not in the original bill. Under those circumstances does the gentleman say they are all one amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not answer the gentleman's question more fully than I have done already. If I have not answered it my remarks have been a failure.

Mr. RANDALL. In every parliamentary body designed for intelligent legislation the organization of the Committee of the Whole House is to give greater latitude of discussion and amendment. Now, can it be possible that the Senate proposition, which is in every item an alteration from the bill that was considered in the House, can be considered to be a single amendment and the House have no opportunity to discuss or amend any proposition involved, when it is perfectly well known that many of those propositions were not considered in the House? In other words, it is asking this House to delegate to three of its members not only the adjustment of differences between the two Houses, but the whole consideration as to matters which have never been discussed in the House.

I am at a loss to conceive how it can possibly be held that a division is not allowable in such a case. Now, suppose that the question of non-concurrence in this amendment as it is described is negatived. That vote is equivalent to concurrence and immediately passes the bill; passes a bill in fact containing matters which the House has never even considered.

Mr. BAYNE. There are two principles of construction which dominate our rules; whether they are right or whether they are wrong is not the question now. What the practice of the House has been under them is the question.

One principle is that there are certain bills that have to be considered by clauses and by paragraphs, and all other bills are subject to consideration by sections. The bills which are to be considered by clauses and paragraphs are enumerated on page 314 of the Digest:

General appropriation, tariff, and tax bills are considered by clauses; other bills by sections.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to page 441 of the Digest:

The river and harbor bill not being a general appropriation bill its paragraphs or clauses are treated and considered as sections.

The bill which we have now before us, however, comes from the Senate, and in what form? I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 137 of the bill. Immediately under line 8 are these words:

Passed the Senate with an amendment.

Not with amendments but "with an amendment," thus showing the construction which the Senate itself put upon the amendment which it has passed to the river and harbor bill that went from the House to the Senate. That is in the singular number; and what has come to us from the Senate is not a number of amendments but an amendment, and only an amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is plainly laid down by numerous decisions that an amendment coming from the Senate to the House is not divisible; I care not what the subject-matter may be, how multiform it may be, it is not divisible, and I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 333 of the Digest:

But it has been decided on appeals that on motions to commit with instructions or on the different branches of instructions—on a Senate amendment—on an amendment reported as a single amendment from a Committee of the Whole, on a series of resolutions proposed to be inserted in lieu of other matter—

Much like this amendment coming from the Senate. A series of resolutions containing a variety of subjects is analogous to this amendment which comes from the Senate with a great variety of subjects embraced in it. And with reference to every one of those cases I have enumerated—a division of the question can not be had.

My colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says he does not see any good reason why this should not be divisible, because it contains a variety of subjects. His logic may be good; his reason may be good. But the fact is the parliamentary law excludes the theory upon which he advocates a division of the amendment, because we have here a single amendment from the Senate, and although it does embrace, as set forth here, a variety of matters, it is not divisible and must be voted on as an entirety.

Now, is there any logical reason for that? There is. The whole conference system grows out of that. The House is protected. The theory upon which my colleague proceeds is that if this entire amendment be disposed of by one vote many individual items might go through to which the House might dissent. But as the House intrusted the preparation of this bill to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, so it intrusts to that committee the management of it; and if the bill is sent to a conference committee, and that committee reports, separate votes may be had on the items on which they disagree. So there is a perfect protection; and there is no reason for assuming that the House may do that which it ought not to do if this amendment of the Senate be voted upon as an entirety. It would be a violation of parliamentary law and of correct principles to divide the question, and would lead to endless complications, while the theory of parliamentary law, which is clearly applicable to this case, entitles us to have one vote upon the entire Senate amendment, and thus dispose of the bill and send it to a committee of conference.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee but a few moments. There is no question but that Rule XX provides that an amendment which if it had been in the nature of a bill would have required its first consideration in Committee of the Whole must, when the point is made, be considered in that committee. It is assumed that this entire revision of the bill of the House by the Senate is but a single amendment. Why is it so assumed? Simply because the Senate has said so. I apprehend that it will be the duty of the Chair to look at what has been returned to us from the Senate and determine by inspection whether it is an amendment or a series of amendments. For instance, we sent to the Senate a bill containing divers sections. That which is returned in the shape of an amendment, as is assumed, contains a great number of sections, or, if you please, a great number of independent clauses, each of them having reference to a separate subject-matter.

Suppose the two bills are entirely dissimilar in their provisions, will it be insisted that this legislation, treating of a large number of harbors and rivers and creeks and streams, is but a single indivisible amendment? Then, if any of the propositions contained in the amendment have been considered in the first instance in the House, and we may not now have a division of those questions, that constitutes the committee of conference, the congress, the supreme legislative body. The committee of conference absorbs the entire power of giving original consideration to a series of amendments or clauses that were never considered in the House of Representatives at all or in Committee of the Whole. I want to make myself understood. If it be true that these amendments, these clauses in this bill, in whole or in part, have never been considered in the House of Representatives at all, and if we are compelled now to vote upon them as a whole, upon a mere motion to reject or approve, and then to commit the bill to a committee of conference, there is no use in the rule which requires the consideration of them in the first instance in the Committee of the Whole, because the whole power of original consideration is given to a committee of conference.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman permit a question? If this amendment is one and indivisible, so that the House can not divide it, how can a committee of conference divide it?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I can not answer the question. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said, in the next place, that this amendment is but a small departure from the original bill. I ask the Chair how this committee knows that to be true? How does the Chair know it? How can it be ascertained, except by reading each clause and comparing what has been sent to us by the Senate with the original bill passed by the House? The very statement of the proposition involves the necessity of reading all these amendments and the consideration of each separate clause. It seems to me that in the interest of the expedition of business these amendments ought to be considered separately, and if we come to any clause upon which we concur in the action of the Senate, then as to that there is no necessity of a conference, and by eliminating from the conference such of the amendments as are in accord with our judgment we facilitate the final consideration and disposition of the bill. As I said before, I hope we shall be compelled to consider it by paragraphs, for the purpose of eliminating from it a number of obnoxious provisions that have been interpolated by the Senate into the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the committee for three or four minutes. Let us stand face to face with the proposition involved here. The House passed a bill with so many paragraphs and sent it to the Senate. The Senate could have taken those paragraphs and amended them separately one by one. Had that been done, then I grant that it would have been the right of any member on this floor, had he seen fit to exercise it (although it would have been a departure from the usage that prevails here), to call for a vote upon each and every paragraph. But the Senate did not deal with the bill in that way. Upon other appropriations the Senate has taken that action, but not upon this. When, this morning, the naval appropriation bill was reported to this House with a motion to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, I did not hear my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] lift his voice in indignation because he was not aware what those amendments were. Appropriation bill after appropriation bill has come here in that way, and my friend has made no complaint. When a committee of the House have reported back a bill with a unanimous recommendation to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, the House, looking to the right and the courtesy of the matter, has usually accepted their statement and united with them in non-concurring in the action of the Senate, reserving to itself the right to vote upon the propositions when the committee of conference come in with their report.

Now the only difference between this bill and other bills which have come before this Congress is that it stands in a peculiar position not occupied by them. It stands in the position of being brought before this House as a single amendment, not as twenty, or thirty, or forty different propositions. Waiving the question of courtesy, waiving the question of right, we are shut up to the conclusion that the House can act only on this single proposition.

"But," says some gentleman, "Rule XX provides that we shall consider all these appropriations in the Committee of the Whole." Where are we now? We are in that committee; and the sole proposition urged by gentlemen who oppose this measure is that the majority of this House shall be deprived of its right to do what it desires to do—to dispose of this question by one vote, instead of having three or four gentlemen gratified by having each distinct matter embraced in the bill voted on separately. That is the whole proposition.

"But," says the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], "does the House intend to abdicate its rights?" When can a majority abdicate its rights? If we pass this vote of non-concurrence, who does it? Is it the Senate that does it? It is the House of Representatives acting by a majority vote—ay, acting, I undertake to say, by a four-fifths vote. Is that an abdication of our rights? Do we thereby surrender any of our privileges? If we want to do this, we shall do it by our own voluntary votes, and we shall do it under the rules.

But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says, "I want a division." The attention of the Chair has been called to the decisions affirming that a Senate amendment can not be divided. Only as lately as yesterday when a House bill in regard to the timber-culture law came from the Senate with several new sections—a new bill—the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] moved to take up the first section and dispose of it separately; and his motion was promptly ruled out by the Chair, because the measure as an entirety was a single Senate amendment and could not be divided. So that as lately as yesterday from that very chair this point was decided. And no evil can result from the course which I am advocating. The House by a majority vote, accepting this action of the Senate as an entirety, rejects it and sends it into conference. I respectfully ask the Chair to put the question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] who has just taken his seat cites a ruling which, I take it, is the same ruling cited by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]. I ask the attention of the Chair to the case cited by the gentleman from South Carolina from the House Journal, second session Thirty-second Congress. It appears from an examination of the Journal that when this question was raised this forty-second amendment had already been considered in Committee of the Whole and had been reported to the House. There had been a motion to suspend the rules and limit debate in Committee of the Whole upon it. After the measure had got out of the Committee of the Whole, and before the demand made by Mr. Stephens, there was a motion to suspend the rules so as to omit even the reading of the proposition. It was being proceeded with in the House, having actually passed from the committee under a special order fixed by a suspension of the rules; and the House was not at that time considering it under the rules.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will ask the gentleman whether that amendment of which he is speaking was not an entire bill, containing nine sections?

Mr. BLOUNT. That is true. But the question which we are now discussing is as to proceedings in Committee of the Whole. It does not appear from the record whether or not the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole by paragraphs; there is no light upon that question. When it came into the House it came as the forty-second amendment, and the rules were suspended so as to omit the reading of the whole of that amendment, and it was in the House that this ruling was made; therefore it has no application to proceedings in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DIBBLE. If the gentleman will permit a further interruption, I will state that I have examined the Globe, and found that the measure was considered in Committee of the Whole as an entirety; and the question raised was not whether an amendment coming from the Committee of the Whole should be——

Mr. BLOUNT. Now the gentleman is undertaking——

Mr. DIBBLE. I will not take the gentleman's time if he objects.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend has had his time, and I am now occupying mine.

Mr. Chairman, I ran over the record with the gentleman at the Clerk's desk, and it did not appear, so far as I could see, that there was any question raised such as is raised here.

But we need not go back to those times when the rules were different from our present rules. At that time debate in Committee of the Whole was limited under a suspension of the rules. It would seem that whatever was done in Committee of the Whole was preceded in the House by a motion to suspend the rules. We have now no such proceedings. I have not before me those old rules, but it is very manifest that the mode of procedure at that period was entirely different from our present methods of proceeding. Since the war we have adopted a rule intended to prevent the bad results which had followed from too hasty consideration of Senate amendments. A rule has been adopted declaring that Senate amendments containing appropriations shall receive their first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Now, here is a measure coming from the Senate, containing not one proposition involving a single expenditure, but scores of propositions relating to different public works and each requiring special investigation, the consideration of different classes of facts—propositions just as different as they possibly can be. Now, because the Senate sees fit for its own convenience, or perhaps for the very purpose of preventing proper consideration under the rules of the House, to adopt language declaring these various propositions to be one amendment, is it possible that this House will violate its own practical common sense and declare that these scores of amendments, these scores of paragraphs containing different propositions, shall be considered as a single proposition because the Senate sees fit to treat them as such?

It seems gentlemen need but look at it. Here is House bill 7480, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. After the bill has been sent to the Senate it has been returned to us with an entirely new scheme. I do not imagine any one will say that the House bill as it was passed was one proposition. By the Senate amendment that whole bill has been stricken out. In that Senate amendment are used about the same terms. It provides in the beginning just as the House bill did:

> That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works herein named.

The next paragraph is for improving the harbor at Rockland, Me.; and the next for improving the breakwater at the mouth of Saco River, and so on through that State.

The amendment is divided into paragraphs identically as the House bill was, and when that House bill was under consideration in the committee it was considered paragraph by paragraph, and not in its entirety. Now, a bill constructed on the same principle, precisely as the House bill, you will undertake by the use of the language of the Senate to avoid the purpose of the House that these paragraphs shall be considered separately.

Gentlemen say the House is not taken advantage of by this vote; that the majority of the House may refuse to do it; that is, refuse to substitute the Senate amendment for the House bill. The House has not thought it right to get the attention of the House in that way. It has thought it to be wise and prudent to prescribe a rule for the Committee of the Whole, so that no strong impulse of the House shall be able to turn it away from that wise course of procedure.

I trust this House, when we consider this House originates the appropriations to pay the expenditures of this great Government, will not, prompted by a desire to pass this bill in this hurried way, evade a rule which has been observed for years and sanctioned by the wise judgment of every House from the time when it was first adopted until now. Let us make no temporary expedient. Let us adhere to the mode of procedure we have adopted in reference to every other like proposition. Do not let us sanction such a deviation from the well-known rule of this House simply because the Senate has chosen to offer a single amendment to the House bill, when it is from beginning to end constructed of separate sections precisely like the House bill itself.

Mr. HEPBURN. . Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to Rule XX:

Any amendment of the Senate to any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union if, originating in the House, it would be subject to that point.

The Chair, in sending this amendment to the Committee of the Whole House, held this proposition if it had originated in the House would have had to go there.

Let us inquire for a moment why should it go there. Why should this proposition be sent to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? We find an answer to that in the third clause of Rule XXIII:

3. All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Mr. WILLIS. If my friend will permit me I will say this motion does not come exactly within that rule. It is only a question of a lump vote or a separate vote.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will try to show it does. This proposition is required to go to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of consideration. If considered, how is it to be considered? It is to be considered as every other appropriation bill is to be considered, and in no other way. We have had ruling after ruling on this proposition. The action of the House itself has established the rule. How have we considered every other appropriation bill? Always by paragraphs. We have always considered an appropriation bill in that way and in no other. Each paragraph has been read. No one has claimed it should be considered by sections, but by paragraphs, each one open to amendment and discussion.

We have here an amendment, so called, a single amendment. Admit for the sake of argument that it is; but it is made up of more than three hundred distinct clauses, each one providing an appropriation of money. Is it not true then that this should be considered now just as it was originally? Does it change its status in any manner to call it a single amendment? When we were considering the original bill one single section contained hundreds of clauses. No gentleman then contended that the entire section should be considered as a whole. All admitted that it was to be considered in separate and distinct clauses, and that was done.

Now, what is there in the rules of the House, what is there in our mode of procedure here, that changes the character of this amendment in gross, if you choose to call it so? It seems to me that this is an important question, one that the Chair ought to give grave consideration to. We spent weeks of time in the consideration of this bill, and the Senate has done the same thing. It has carried at different times $18,000,000. Now it is proposed that this new bill, for it is new in view of its various clauses—not one of them appears before the House now as when we considered it; not one of them was before the Committee of the Whole when we considered the bill some two or three months ago—but it is proposed that all the legislation with regard to this new and important bill shall be turned over to six gentlemen, members of this House, in order that they may engage in trade and traffic in regard to their different measures, or those of which they approve. I say, sir, it is not a wise procedure. There is no propriety in taking from the aggregate membership of this House their power and vesting it in three, or four, or six other gentlemen, no matter how wise or judicious they may be. Their wisdom and judiciousness is not equal to the aggregate wisdom of the entire House, and it is infinitely better for us in the consideration of this important measure that it should be before the House in its aggregate capacity rather than turned over to two, or three, or any other number of gentlemen, where in their haste, in their anxiety to secure some kind of action, they will be prevailed upon to give their assent to things their better judgment at other times would condemn.

I am utterly opposed to that kind of legislation. We might just as well remit the whole duty of making appropriations of this character, not to the Committee on Appropriations of the House, not to the fifteen gentlemen who compose that committee in the House and the gentlemen who compose the committee at the other end of the Capitol, but to six gentlemen selected from the House, and allow them to engage indiscriminately in this important legislation. The purpose now is to take this matter out of the hands of the House and put it in their hands. I do not regard that as wise. To my mind it would be a most obnoxious procedure, and I hope the conclusion of the Chair will be in opposition to such a dangerous principle in legislation.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, the rules of the House provide that the Senate amendments to these appropriation bills may be required under the point of order to have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole. But, as has been well said by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the House is now, in Committee of the Whole, dealing with one amendment, and it is certainly within the province of the committee to determine just how it will deal with that one amendment, and the chairman should allow the committee to do it.

The question pressed by the opposition to this bill is that the committee should not determine for itself how it will deal with that amendment of the Senate, but that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole shall determine for the committee how the committee shall deal with it.

Now the gentleman from Iowa says that he is opposed to allowing a committee of conference to deal with so important and momentous a question as this; that it ought not to be allowed that liberty. I want to congratulate him and the gentleman from Indiana and others on their recent reform, if it be true that they are opposed to trusting a committee of conference with that power. I remember, sir, in the Forty-seventh Congress that the House was called to consider a tariff bill. A little bill to amend the internal-revenue laws went from this House to the Senate. The Senate struck out the House bill and sent a tariff bill back here as an amendment with seven times seventy distinct items. That bill was never read in the House or in the Committee of the Whole. The whole tariff with its schedules annexed, all of the items, hundreds and thousands of articles, and it never was read in this House, but was licked into form in the conference by these virtuous and careful gentlemen who are straining so at this gnat but who swallowed that camel without oiling at one great gulp, and it was fully and perfectly digested by them. While the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], though he may not have approved of the process by which the progeny of that conference was brought forth, yet he was so delighted with the measure that he has voted steadily and uniformly against all interference with it from that day to this. Why, if a conference committee can be trusted to coddle and nourish and fix up such a wonderful young one as that progeny proved to be, might it not be also trusted with a little river and harbor bill?

May it not be trusted to deal with these questions of improvement of public works which the people believe to be of great importance in the interest of cheap transportation. That went to the extreme length of the power of taxation, while this only involves a moderate measure of appropriations? The Committee of the Whole refused there, with the sanction of the chairman, to consider all those items of a tariff bill and sent it into conference; and those gentlemen have "pointed with pride" to that delightful piece of work ever since. Consistency is indeed "a jewel."

Now, the question simply is: Shall this committee be permitted to do what it has the right to do? I am gratified that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who is always frank and straightforward and who has no concealments, has served such prompt notice on the friends of this measure that it is to be lost. We know it has been an open secret here for more than three weeks that this bill is to be lost. It is to be adjourned upon. That is understood.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am credibly informed it will be lost, whether we adjourn upon it or not.

Mr. DUNN. I do not know when the gentleman became the confidant of the President, nor how far he is authorized to speak for him; but let me inform the gentleman that if my voice can reach the friends of this measure, the enemies of it will have to find some way to adjourn this Congress without the consent of a majority of this House if it be done before this bill goes into conference and is finally voted upon by each House. I call upon the friends of the measure here and now to serve notice upon the managers who have preordained the defeat of this bill that no adjournment resolution can be voted upon in this House nor carried by a majority of this House till this bill is finally acted upon.

I am ready to sit here all summer; and we will promise you a better piece of work, too, than that monstrosity of the tariff of the Forty-seventh Congress which you swallowed whole without the oiling from a Committee of the Whole. It will be a much better piece of work than that; and I hope the friends of this measure will stay here and firmly demand fair play.

I hope the chairman of this committee will permit the committee to determine whether it will consider this amendment as an entirety and send it to a conference, instead of being compelled to go through it item by item, for every item in the bill is in dispute.

The CHAIRMAN. If the proposition raised by the point of order was an original one the Chair would have no hesitation in deciding upon it. But the precedents and rulings of the House to which the Chair will adhere are to the effect that this amendment of the Senate is one amendment and must be so considered by the House or the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment will be read at length; and after it is read, pending the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to non-concur in the Senate amendment, the Chair holds that a motion by any member to amend the amendment in any particular, to concur with an amendment, or to concur by striking out any paragraph in the amendment, is in order and takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to non-concur.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. What will be the rule of debate governing the consideration of those propositions?

The CHAIRMAN. The ordinary rule of debate, five minutes for and five minutes against.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The Chair, as I understand, holds this is one amendment and must be treated as an entirety. But before the question is put on the motion to non-concur and ask a committee of conference the Chair will entertain a motion to amend. I want to know if the right to offer amendments will be extended to each independent proposition in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Each and every paragraph in the bill the Chair thinks is subject to the motion of any member to concur with an amendment, or to concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment striking out any paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the Chair stated that general debate is cut off?

The CHAIRMAN. No limit to general debate has yet been fixed. The debate which has been allowed has been on the point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to limit general debate to one minute.

Mr. MCADOO. I would like to amend that by making it two hours.

Mr. RANDALL. In Committee of the Whole debate can be limited only by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to limit general debate to one minute?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. What time does the gentleman from Indiana propose?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am willing to agree to the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. WILLIS. I rise for the purpose of speaking on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the Senate amendment, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. If the bill be now read through will another reading be necessary?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It will, I should think, unless dispensed with.

Mr. BAYNE. That is what I apprehended—that another reading might be necessary.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, so that it may be read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas, in the judgment of the Chair there will be but one reading of the amendment. It is one amendment; but when it has been read once it will not be necessary to again read it by paragraphs. But it is open and subject to amendment by paragraphs.

Mr. DUNN. As the reading proceeds?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to refuse to put the request for unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not.

Mr. REAGAN. Then are we to understand that when it is read once it is to be indiscriminately open to amendment everywhere?

The CHAIRMAN. After the amendment of the Senate has been read it will be competent for any member of the House to offer an amendment to any paragraph.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the Senate amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to occupy more than a minute or two in the statement of the status of this bill. The Senate has amended the House bill in only five or six important particulars. It has, however, applied a scaling process to the remaining paragraphs of the bill as it left the House. Now, all the paragraphs of this bill except some half a dozen have already been considered, first by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of this House, second by the Committee of the Whole of this House, and third by the House itself. Then on the passage of the bill and its transmission to the Senate, these various paragraphs have received full consideration in the Senate Committee on Commerce, then in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and finally in the Senate itself. The final vote in the Senate as to all of these paragraphs except some half dozen resulted, as I have stated, in scaling down the House appropriations some 25 per cent.

The House committee upon receiving the Senate bill has thought proper, pursuing the customs and usages which have always prevailed in this House, to report in favor of a formal non-concurrence in each and every one of the Senate amendments, with a view to having a conference thereon. This is the sole question now pending before this Committee of the Whole—whether we shall non-concur in the whole of the Senate amendment or not.

Now, I submit in good faith to the members of this Committee of the Whole that even disregarding the fact that the Senate has adopted but one amendment, and has coupled with that a request for a conference, which it was hoped could be acceded to at once without referring the bill again to the committee of this House—waiving that, I say, in view of the usages which have prevailed and in view of the lateness of the hour at which this bill comes to us from the Senate, I think good judgment and good parliamentary proceeding will require that we take the same steps in reference to this bill that we took in regard to the naval bill, and which, I presume, we shall take in regard to the sundry civil bill, which may soon be over here with probably one hundred and fifty amendments, the fortification bill, and other general appropriation bills. In other words, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors respectfully request this House to have enough confidence in them to believe that they will protect the House, and allow a vote upon matters which have been put on by the Senate and which may be in dispute between the two Houses.

With this view, Mr. Chairman, after this brief statement I now ask the Committee of the Whole to agree to some time within which general debate may be limited, if any gentleman has any suggestion to make upon that point. [A pause.] If no one desires general debate I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the Senate amendment may be now closed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIS. I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate amendment is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move to amend by substituting for the first section of the Senate bill what I send to the desk, which is simply the first section of the bill as it passed the House. My object is simply as each section comes up to introduce as an amendment exactly what the House adopted on the same subject, so that we may get back to our original bill and let the matter go into conference. This amendment covers over one thousand lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas moves to amend section 1 of the Senate amendment in the manner which will be read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the proposition be submitted to a vote without being read. It is simply the corresponding provision of the House bill which we have already adopted. [Addressing Mr. WILLIS.] Do you want to make a motion?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then I withdraw my proposition.

Mr. WILLIS. As the gentleman from Arkansas withdraws his amendment, I now renew my motion for non-concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the Senate amendment by striking out lines 1195 to 1234 inclusive, being what is known as the Hennepin Canal provision. I make this motion because the House in Committee of the Whole——

Mr. CANNON. Let us have the amendment reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

"The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its rights of way and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the general assembly of the State of Illinois approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

"For the construction of a canal from the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at or above the mouth of Rock River, in said State, together with such feeders and other works that may be necessary to supply said canal with water, $225,000. Said canal shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as may be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and feeders, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and in such proceedings said court shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois, so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use: Provided further, That said canal shall be 80 feet wide at the water-line and 7 feet deep, with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and all other erections and fixtures that may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and feeder as specified in said survey."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I make the point of order that it is not proper for the House to strike out a Senate amendment. It is in order to amend a Senate amendment, provided the amendment offered be strictly germane to the Senate amendment. A motion to non-concur or to concur is the motion properly in order; but an amendment germane to the Senate amendment may be submitted. Now, what would be the effect if the House should strike out the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. It would not be there.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. The amendment was put there by the Senate; it would be there just as much as it is now, even if the House should adopt the gentleman's motion to strike out that portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not to strike out the Senate amendment. The Chair has already held that the amendment upon which the committee is acting is an entirety. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] simply moves to strike out a single paragraph in that amendment. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the Chair will not rule on that for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to know just what position that ruling would leave this bill in. Here is a Senate amendment that comes to us as an entirety. There is but one way to disagree to a Senate amendment, namely, to non-concur, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has made that motion. If the House refuses to non-concur, then concurrence necessarily follows. I read from the Digest, page 318:

> The question which first arises on a resolution, amendment, or conference report is on concurrence. And, as the negative of concurrence amounts to the affirmative of non-concurrence, no question is afterward put on the latter motion.

Now, suppose this House refuses to non-concur, then it concurs. I fail to see how this motion can be in order on a Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to take the position that the House has not the right to non-concur in a Senate amendment with an amendment?

Mr. CANNON. No; the House has a right to non-concur or rather concur in a Senate amendment with an amendment, but a motion to non-concur is the proper motion by which to disagree with the Senate.

Mr. ROWELL. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is made as an amendment to the motion to non-concur, and the substance of it would be to non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate, but especially to non-concur in this Hennepin Canal amendment. It is simply adding non-concurrence in the whole and non-concurrence in a part, and that certainly can not be in order.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know any way except non-concurrence in which you can disagree to an amendment of the Senate. I will grant that if this whole matter went to conference upon a motion to non-concur in all the Senate amendments when it returned upon the report of the conference committee it would be in order for the House to recede or to insist as it might determine. But I will ask the Chair to think a minute and see what shape this bill will be in when it returns to the Senate. Suppose it were amended by striking out this part of the Senate amendment, will the Chair tell me how the report would be made to the Senate, or, in the first place, how it would be made to the House from the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the matter is plain. I make a motion to amend the amendment of the Senate, which takes precedence of the motion to non-concur.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if we give this matter a moment's impartial examination we shall have no difficulty in arriving at a correct, and, as I believe, a true conclusion. The Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], I grant you, may make a motion to non-concur, but he does not seem to draw the distinction between a motion to non-concur and a motion to strike out. Let us look at the effect. If I make a motion that we do not concur and it prevails, that is one thing; but if I make also a motion to strike out, what is the consequence? There is nothing then to be considered. The bill is absolutely killed. It is disposed of. We would take up then this river and harbor bill and commence at the first appropriation and move to strike that out. Very well. We would go to the second and we would move to strike that out. Very well. So we would go on until we had struck out each and every one of these provisions; and then what would there be to concur in?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Nothing.

Mr. MURPHY. Nothing. Then I ask, in all candor and sincerity, what are we here for [laughter] if it is not to accomplish something? I admit that some gentlemen here have just expressed, perhaps for the first time in their lives, a candid truth, but I am frank to say that I believe that my people sent me here for something, and did not send me here to be a nobody, for a nothing. I rose to call attention to the distinction between the motion to strike out and the motion to non-concur, and I hope the Chair will see the point.

Mr. CANNON. A word more, Mr. Chairman.

The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] covers every line of this amendment and is a proposition on the part of the House to dissent entirely from the amendment of the Senate and every part of it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania comes and makes a motion, as my colleague well said, which in effect, if sustained, will non-concur by striking out this part of it.

Mr. RANDALL. The House sent the bill to the Senate and the Senate non-concurred in every part of it.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you undertake to say when that amendment comes back it is not competent for this Committee of the Whole to amend that amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly it is competent to amend.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all I have done.

Mr. CANNON. But your motion is of the same effect to that part of the Senate amendment as the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. RANDALL. The motion to amend is prior to the motion to non-concur. The motion to non-concur is a mere recommendation to the House at best.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the House that non-concurs, it is the Committee of the Whole that amends.

Mr. CANNON. I may be mistaken about this matter. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania what will be the effect if the gentleman's motion prevails?

Mr. RANDALL. It will leave out this part of the amendment of the Senate——

Mr. CANNON. But would not this part of the amendment of the Senate go nevertheless back to the Senate?

Mr. RANDALL. It would not.

Mr. CANNON. Would it not be in conference?

Mr. RANDALL. It would be left out and it would be equivalent——

Mr. CANNON. Equivalent to what?

Mr. MURPHY. The conference would have to consider the whole Senate amendment just as it is.

Mr. RANDALL. When gentlemen get through and will talk one at a time I will try to answer them.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair will allow me I will proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois when the committee comes to order.

Mr. CANNON. The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or that which he calls an amendment, to strike out would be a disposition of this provision of the Senate so as not to place it in conference, as he states. I undertake to say there is no mode of action by the House that would have that effect unless we concur with the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. We are in Committee of the Whole and not in the House.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly we are in the Committee of the Whole; but what is competent to be done in the committee by way of recommendation to the House is competent to be done in the House when the bill is reported back.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no rule of the House which debars the Committee of the Whole amending the Senate amendment, whether in entirety by a single amendment or by a number of amendments.

Mr. CANNON. What rule?

Mr. RANDALL. Whether this is a single amendment or many amendments, each one of these appropriations is a distinctive, substantive proposition which the committee has the right to pass upon.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, but the Chair has just held that this Senate amendment must be treated as a whole. Suppose it is a single proposition. The Chair takes that view of it, and his decision stands. Let us see how that works. The gentleman from Kentucky proposes to non-concur in the Senate amendment. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out a part of that Senate amendment. Suppose it pleases the committee to strike out and also to sustain the motion to non-concur and the House agrees to the amendments recommended. That lets in a motion not known to parliamentary law, and we would have non-concurrence in the whole of the Senate amendment and in effect non-concurrence in a part of the Senate amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know much about parliamentary law, but I am interested in this bill. As I understand, it originated in the House and contains some thirty or forty pages. It was passed in this body and sent over to the Senate. It was returned from the Senate to this House with the enacting clause stricken out. The Chair has decided what the Senate put in, which in substance is the entire House bill only scaled down, is in fact but one amendment.

Now, sir, as I understand parliamentary law as embodied in the rules and practice of this House, if we should amend that amendment of the Senate in any particular way it would not go to the Senate again. That is to say, I do not understand that by an amendment we can send it back to the Senate. On the other hand, if it was referred to a committee of conference, and thus pass out of the control of the House, when that committee reported it back again whether it would be in our power to amend it or not is a question; and what I want to know is whether, if the bill gets to a conference committee, and the committee of the House and Senate, having met, shall agree to report the bill back to the House—whether any gentleman on this floor will have an opportunity to disagree with that committee by offering the amendments he deems necessary to the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. I take it for granted that no one will assume we are considering this bill now as we were considering the original bill in the House, where it is competent to move to strike out any particular clause of the bill. This bill has already passed the House and has been sent to the Senate, where it was amended. We can not now strike out a clause of the bill, because if we strike it out we have nothing to return to the Senate in lieu of it. It drops the whole matter out of the bill and leaves no mode of conferring between the two Houses upon the disagreement. An amendment would be in order, of course, to move to non-concur with an amendment; but a motion to strike out would violate parliamentary law and the usage of the House, and would leave the bill, if it could be tolerated here, in such a shape that a member of either the House or the Senate could reintroduce the proposition in either body, and so the two Houses might be interminably striking out and putting in. There would never be a conclusion upon any legislation.

But what would be the effect of this motion to strike out if adopted? You could not expect the Senate to accept our work without question, to strike out the amendment without giving them the privileges of a conference; and so I take it we are not going to commit the folly of striking out the clause when the question, and the only question, is upon concurrence, non-concurrence, or concurrence with an amendment.

These are the only three motions, as I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows, in this condition of the bill that can be entertained at this time—that is, to non-concur, to concur, or to concur or non-concur with an amendment.

Now in relation to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] last on the floor, as to whether if this goes into conference it would be in the power of the House to control the question as to the shape in which the bill shall finally pass, let me say to him that the conference reports as they are submitted to the House are always subject to its control; and I am very free to say if upon a conference a portion of the amendment of the Senate is not stricken out I will not vote for the bill. While I am anxious to have a proper bill, yet I do not propose to engage in the folly of undertaking here in this manner to strike out an amendment of the Senate, the result of which would be that the Senate would put it in again, if indeed (the House acting in such a discourteous manner), the Senate would consider the action of the House at all. And they would be perfectly justifiable, because if we strike this out and then send the bill back to the Senate with such an amendment as that, I take it they will treat it as a discourtesy, and in that respect further proceedings between the two Houses on this question would terminate.

Mr. RANDALL. Why, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union might strike out various paragraphs so as to make the Senate amendments acceptable to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania treats this as one amendment, and that his motion would be an amendment to the amendment. Now, I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself and certainly some other gentlemen on the floor contended that we must consider this bill in Committee of the Whole by clauses as we did the original bill, but not with the power to strike out the particular clauses. I do not think we could do that. I defer, of course, to the superior parliamentary knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I do not wish to take a course which, in my opinion, is unjustified by parliamentary law, and which will induce the Senate to regard as a great discourtesy this action on the part of the House, an action which I apprehend they will not be likely to tolerate. If there is an amendment to a clause, why propose that amendment to it; but do not undertake to strike out the whole clause inserted by the Senate, for it seems to me that is not the way in which we ought to proceed; and I have no doubt if we attempt to do so it will lead to unpleasant consequences.

I think all these questions should go into conference, and that is the only proper way to dispose of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this controversy is more as to the form of expression than as to the substance of the matter. By reference to Jefferson's Manual, page 273 of our Digest, it will be seen that this subject of amendment between the two Houses is very simple and easily understood. For instance:

When either House, the House of Representatives for example, sends a bill to the other, the other may pass it with amendments.

That is just what has been done here. The chairman holds that it is but one amendment.

The regular progression in this case is: that the House disagree to the amendment; the Senate insist on it; the House insist on their disagreement; the Senate adhere to their amendment; the House adhere to their disagreement.

Which, of course, produces a disagreement between both Houses and a consequent loss of the bill. We have not reached that stage yet. But further:

A motion to amend an amendment from the other House takes precedence of a motion to agree or disagree. A bill originating in one House is passed by the other with an amendment. The originating House agree to their amendment with an amendment. The other may agree to their amendment with an amendment, that being only in the second and not in the third degree, &c.

Now the condition is just this. The House passed this river and harbor bill and sent it to the Senate. The Senate struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted practically a new bill. The chairman regards this as one amendment. The House, to have a text to build upon, must predicate its amendment on the fact that we agree to something the Senate has done with an amendment thereto. The proper motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is to move to agree with the Senate amendment with the following amendment thereto, to strike out the lines he has indicated. That brings the question before the Senate. Another amendment will be offered that we agree to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment thereto striking out so many dollars and inserting so many dollars, being an intimation to the Senate that we want to raise or lower the amount in their amendment. It is simply a matter of form. What we want to get is an expression of the opinion of the two Houses as to each of these items.

Mr. REAGAN. I would ask the gentleman how many times can we agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment? Can we do it three hundred times?

Mr. SPRINGER. We are now in Committee of the Whole House. When our report is made by the chairman of the committee it will be that the Committee of the Whole recommend that the House concur with the Senate amendment with the following amendments thereto; and that brings the whole subject before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit that we have to follow the rules. According to the theory of the gentleman from Illinois you can attach three hundred and odd amendments to a single amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. What I have submitted provides a plainer and more direct mode of arriving at what is desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is the ordinary motion to amend the Senate amendment. The Senate amendment is open to amendment under the rules of the House, and if it be amended, either by striking out certain words or by inserting certain other words, that sends the entire proposition to a conference if one be ordered, including, of course, the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate. It is simply an expression of the House for the first time on the new matter inserted in that amendment which has been sent to the House by the Senate. The Chair holds the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to detain the committee with debate on this proposition. All of us understand what it is for, what it means, and the amount involved. So far as I am concerned I am content with asking a vote.

Mr. WILLIS. I especially ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to make this motion. The motion I have made, I think, with all due deference to him, includes that motion; the whole includes the part. The motion I am instructed unanimously by the committee to make is that we non-concur; and I respectfully request him to allow this matter to go with the others non-concurred in to the committee of conference, and the House will at a later period have a better opportunity than now for a fair and full expression of opinion. I hope he will not press that motion at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. The House by a very marked vote declined to insert this paragraph. Now if the House has changed its mind in this particular I do not know why it should not have that right of expression which a vote on this amendment will give.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is laboring under a mistake. The House has not declined to insert this paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee did.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The House refused to consider the proposition.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state that this was not in the river and harbor bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is thinking of the action in a prior session.

Mr. RANDALL. Perhaps.

Mr. WILLIS. At this session the proposition was brought in by the Committee on Railways and Canals, and had a day for its consideration.

Mr. MURPHY. And received a majority of 14.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Only a majority for consideration.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I raised the question of consideration myself on the Hennepin Canal bill.

Mr. MURPHY. That vote showed it had a majority on this floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let us see whether it has now or not.

Mr. BAYNE obtained the floor.

Mr. NEECE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEECE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves to non-concur in the entire Senate amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves to strike out a certain item, which in effect is a non-concurrence. Therefore the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not have priority over the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky. I insist the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky has priority.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that.

Mr. BAYNE. The attack made upon the Hennepin Canal is the attack made upon the bill. It is intended to involve the bill in difficulties and prevent its passage. It is perfectly known to my colleague from Philadelphia who has made this attack that he can have an opportunity of voting on the Hennepin Canal. When this bill comes from the conference it is perfectly well known if it be the desire to strike out the Hennepin Canal it can be stricken out.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. When it comes from a conference committee it is voted upon as a whole.

Mr. BAYNE. It comes back here and the items of the report of the committee of conference will be taken up and considered seriatim, and a vote can be taken upon this if the House chooses to take it.

Several MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, the purpose is to attack this bill and to involve it in difficulties so as to prevent the passage of any river and harbor bill. Therefore, in my opinion, the friends of this bill should stand by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The committee intend to ask for a vote of non-concurrence in the Senate amendments thereto, then put the bill into the hands of a committee of conference, and let that committee report to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; and when that committee reports you will have to take the report as a whole.

Mr. BAYNE. Very well. If the Hennepin Canal is objectionable to a majority of the members of the House they can vote the report down; or the conference report can be sent back to the committee by a vote of the House with instructions to strike out the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. RANDALL. There are other objectionable items in the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. There are other ways by which a vote can be reached if that be the purpose in view, but the real purpose is to involve this bill in difficulties and prevent its passage. Therefore I again ask the members of the House who are in favor of a river and harbor bill to stand by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which is going to move to non-concur, put the bill into the hands of a conference committee, and get it back here upon their report within a few days.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have only to say that this is the only time I see when we can have a vote upon the Hennepin Canal distinct from other propositions. The result of the action that is proposed here is to put this in with the rest of the propositions in this bill and make the others carry the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman has no more authority to make that statement than he would have to make a like statement about the items in any other appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it is generally so with these appropriation bills. What I want is to get a distinct vote upon the Hennepin Canal, and I do not see any other mode of getting it than the one I have suggested.

Mr. WILLIS. There is a mode provided by the rules which has been already suggested.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask my colleague whether the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has jurisdiction over canals.

Mr. BAYNE. We have, over a number of them.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. There are only nine canals in this river and harbor bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The River and Harbor Committee have no jurisdiction over that subject, and they did not put the Hennepin Canal into the bill, because they had not jurisdiction. Now, I believe the sense of this committee is to have a direct vote upon such propositions as this one, but I do not see how we can ever get a vote upon the Hennepin Canal unless we get it now. I have always favored the river and harbor bill, but I have always voted against the Hennepin Canal scheme, and I propose, if I can get a chance, to vote against it again; and if it goes into this bill in this way, and we are obliged to vote ay or no upon the bill as a whole, although for years I have voted for river and harbor bills, yet I may feel it in my conscience a duty to vote against this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the attitude of the opponents of the Hennepin Canal. I do not count the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] as specially an opponent of the Hennepin Canal, because he did all he could to defeat this bill when that project was not in it at all, and therefore I assume that he assails this outwork because he thinks that is the easiest way to breach the main line of the bill. I say I am very much surprised that members here are afraid to vote in favor of the proposition submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. That motion is a motion against the Hennepin Canal; it is a motion to non-concur. Is not that enough?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Oh, yes; but we know what it means.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; we know what all the other schemes here mean. We know what the scheme means to throw this bill into general debate, and, strangely enough, it happens to be proposed and supported by gentlemen who opposed the bill all the way through.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman I am not attempting to embarrass this bill by debate. On the contrary, I ask for a vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand; but if the gentleman's proposition be agreed to, it at once alienates a large vote upon this floor from the proposition of the chairman of the committee to non-concur and send the bill to a committee of conference; not that it will ultimately harm the bill.

I am glad to see gentlemen who pride themselves upon their record at home, and who put into their platform upon which they seek reelection to Congress the high proposition that they have voted always against this river and harbor bill, now suddenly interesting themselves in trying to bring the bill back to the same place where it was when they voted against it.

The proposition of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is to let this whole proposition—without committing the committee at all, for they have not considered the Hennepin Canal, have had nothing to do with it one way or another—to let the whole subject of this bill go to a committee of conference. For what purpose? That we may get along with our business, that we may not project the question here into a debate in Committee of the Whole, which may last for the next two weeks.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, at this time, under the five-minute rule and with debate soon to be cut off, I do not propose to discuss the merits of the Hennepin Canal; and I should not have said one word but for what struck me as the unkind and uncalled-for words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL]. Of course I have decided views about the propriety of the Hennepin Canal improvement. I believe that no friend of this bill can make an argument for it that will not apply in every respect in favor of this proposed improvement. There is but one ground on which to place these river and harbor improvements, and that is that they are instrumental in affording the necessary competition to secure a proper regulation of freight charges upon the products of the West and the East, the North and the South.

At a proper time, if I should have opportunity, I will discuss the merits of that question. I desire only to say now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, representing in part that great commercial and manufacturing center Philadelphia, who has appealed to me as well as to all other members on behalf of the interests of his State in favor of wise and statesmanlike legislation affording appropriations for the water ways and other improvements of this country and for the merchant marine and for the Navy of the nation, that in my opinion he does not do himself justice when he rises here in his place and instead of seeking to produce argument showing the unwisdom of this appropriation uses that stale, common, ordinary term, which anybody can cry out against any measure, by denouncing it as a "steal." The cheapest man who pretends to statesmanship, or would even make a vain essay toward it, can daily and hourly indulge in that kind of characterization of any or all appropriations.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this bill with these amendments will take the ordinary course. What is that? That the House at this stage of the session non-concur in the whole of this Senate amendment in all its paragraphs; let the conferees meet and see wherein they can agree, and so far as they can agree, with or without amendment, make report to this House for approval or disapproval in whole or in part. All we ask for the Hennepin Canal proposition is the same treatment that other portions of the bill receive. If the enlightened representatives of sixty million people do not believe that this is a wise proposition, then let it be rejected; but let it be accorded the poor courtesy which is habitually accorded to every other measure.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will allow me to call his attention to the fact that if my amendment should prevail in Committee of the Whole there is no reason why a vote should not be taken upon it in the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been talking about something that he did not understand.

Mr. CANNON. I thought I listened to the gentleman carefully.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If he or any other member of this House ever heard me use such a word as "steal" in any discussion in which I have taken part in this House I should like to know it. I spoke of this proposition as a "scheme;" and I did not in that mean anything offensive to the friends of the proposition.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will allow me to say that I was close to him when he spoke, and understood him to use the other word. I am very glad to learn that he did not, and withdraw all that I said touching that point.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am very glad the gentleman has withdrawn it. Now, if he is so anxious to have the sense of the House upon the question of appropriating money for the Hennepin Canal, let him have the vote here and now. That is the statesmanlike way to meet the question. If the majority of this House should vote that this proposition is properly in the bill, let it remain there. I am sure I will yield to the decision of the majority. But, sir, it is not for the gentleman to give me a lecture as to what I should or should not do as a representative of the commercial city of Philadelphia. I represent a commercial city; he represents an inland community of a great and powerful State. I do not know whether by voting for the appropriation for the Hennepin Canal he is helping to solve the question of freights from the West to the seaboard. Another proposition involving that question will come up in a few days, and he can then be heard. Why, sir, this day the water ways of the country settle the question of the freight on railroads. That is a well-known proposition.

Mr. DUNHAM. The liberality of the gentleman's constituents should induce him to vote for this proposition.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. We shall see how that is when we come to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] as withdrawn.

Mr. SOWDEN. I renew the pro forma amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been confidently asserted that if the House non-concur in the Senate amendment and the bill goes to a committee of conference, when the same is reported back to this House we can have a separate vote upon this proposition. This is a mistake. We can not have a separate vote upon it. It will be too late. My colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has stated the matter correctly. In the Thirty-ninth Congress it was decided that a separate vote could not be taken upon different propositions contained in a conference report, but that it must be adopted or rejected as a whole. (Congressional Globe, volume 1, Thirty-ninth Congress, page 4287.) The only way out of this dilemma is in the manner suggested by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and therefore I ask for a vote on his amendment. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SOWDEN, by unanimous consent, withdrew his pro forma amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The question recurred on Mr. RANDALL'S amendment.

Mr. RANDALL demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 93.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 109.

The CHAIRMAN. So the amendment is rejected. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the paragraph beginning with line 1098 and ending with 1120.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of the two improved water ways known as the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-canal Railway and Iron Company Canal, being the improved harbors of refuge and the water communication across Keweenaw Point, from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior, by way of Portage River and Lake, in the State of Michigan, and to make the same a free passage-way and harbors of refuge to commerce and navigation, $262,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That before said moneys shall be expended the Secretary of War shall cause an examination to be made by a board of three engineers to ascertain and report upon the importance and value of the free use of said two harbors of refuge and the water communications across Keweenaw Point to the commerce and navigation of the Lakes, and the reasonableness of the price thereof, and shall have received from said board a report favorable to such purchase by the United States, and also upon full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said two harbors of refuge, canals, easements, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances of every nature belonging to and connected with said works, or either of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the canal here designated as the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company, or rather the Portage Lake and Lake Michigan Canal, was a work constructed under an act of Congress which was passed in 1865, by which 200,000 acres of land were appropriated to the State of Michigan with which to construct the work.

The canal was constructed and the other enterprises named in the pending amendment. It was equivalent to a grant, as estimated at that time, of a million dollars for the construction of the canal alone. It is now proposed, inasmuch as the purposes of the work have been in a large degree accomplished, as I understand, to transfer it back to the Government at a cost of $265,000; a work constructed by a public grant, a private estate in the State of Michigan, and yet it is now proposed, notwithstanding its origin, that the sum of $265,000 shall be paid out of the public Treasury, and the Government shall go on and take charge of the work. I do not think, sir, that this ought to be done.

The State of Michigan, I should have said, transferred these lands to a corporation; the corporation constructed the canals and now owns the works. Whether this subject was considered by the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors I am not able to say.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me inform the gentleman that it was considered and was not put into the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad to hear it. I am informed by the chairman of the committee that the subject was considered and not deemed proper to be inserted in the bill. It is a barefaced transaction, where a work constructed principally by the Government, with its resources, is to be made the source of large profit to the gentlemen to whom the bounty of the Government was transferred.

Mr. MOFFATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish at this time to go into a discussion of the merits of this question. If the gentleman from Indiana would ask the committee to pursue the same course with this proposition that was pursued with the other, namely, to let it go into conference, then when it comes back before the House I shall be perfectly willing to go with him in detail over the subject and point out what I believe to be its merits. I should be glad to have an opportunity to give to this House, as I believe I can, a full statement of what I regard as the most meritorious proposition in this bill as embodied in this clause of the Senate amendment. But I do not wish to detain the committee at this time; and I think that upon further investigation, in fact I have no doubt of it, the gentleman will agree to take that position himself. I ask the committee now, without detaining it further, not to strike out the provision, but to give it fair play and let it take its course in the committee of conference with the rest of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I object, Mr. Chairman, to these motions to strike out particular portions of the Senate amendment, for the reason that they are subject to the objection that they do not take these things out of the conference one way or the other. The motions are misleading; and I shall vote against motions to strike out. And yet I may be permitted to say that if this provision is retained in the bill, or the one which was just voted upon a few moments ago, I should vote against the whole bill when it comes back to the House. But because these propositions to strike out are misleading and make men vote against their judgment one way or the other I am opposed to them. The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors proposes to non-concur in all of the amendments. That brings the whole subject into a conference. If there is a separate motion upon each item it simply means non-concurrence, and I do not think it is the proper way to get at the consideration of the subject.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senate put some four or five very important amendments on this bill; and I am sure that I express the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors when I say that they have no desire, and if they had the desire they would not dare to exercise it, to accomplish through a conference committee anything that could not be accomplished formally and openly upon the floor of the House. We not only will not decline a vote on these several matters, but I believe I express the opinion of every member of the committee when I say we will invite a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. In the House?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. When?

Mr. WILLIS. After the conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. When did I understand the gentleman to say?

Mr. WILLIS. After we have reported the result of the conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. But then the gentleman knows a separate vote could not be had.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman understands the fact that the committee can come back into the House and a separate vote be taken upon each one of these propositions.

Mr. BLANCHARD. We have no other purpose in view.

Mr. WILLIS. We want a majority of the House to act upon these matters in detail. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors would not dare to put anything into the bill or take anything out except by a fair untrammeled vote of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Will you consent to a separate vote as to the Washington flats?

Mr. WILLIS. There will be no objection to a separate vote as to all of these four or five Senate amendments.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How as to the changes in reference to the Mississippi River Commission?

Mr. WILLIS. As to that I am not prepared to speak.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that as to all the new matters put in this bill by the Senate, the Portage Canal, the Hennepin Canal, and the other three measures which are the most important—with the understanding they are to be all reported to the House for action as separate and independent measures, so that votes can be taken in the House instructing the conferees on the part of the House, it seems to me the better plan would be to acquiesce in what is desired by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. DUNN. Does not that result necessarily follow anyhow? Even if you strike out the item here, it goes into conference anyhow.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is an instruction to the conferees.

Mr. DUNN. Then when the committee of conference reports an agreement or disagreement the House must pass on that.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no legislation so subject to severe condemnation as that forced on the two Houses of Congress by conference committees. It is the most pernicious of all species of our legislation; and I am always glad to see conferees distinctly instructed. And I am surprised that so old and wise a legislator as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] should not himself have seen the importance of a frank expression on the part of the House as to each one of these important Senate amendments.

Mr. REAGAN. I want that expression; but I want it to be in a form that would be effective. I do not want it to go through a blank form that does no good and takes time.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would do good to instruct the conferees as to the sentiment of the House in regard to the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. BURLEIGH. You have done that.

Mr. HOLMAN. You have not. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] voted against striking that out, but says he would vote against the bill if it finally contained that proposition; and other gentlemen have acted on the principle by which the gentleman from Texas is governed. These votes are misleading. They do not represent the sentiment of the House, and do a vast amount of injury to the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. It is for that reason I wish the question taken on non-concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that each of these several important amendments attached to the bill by the Senate shall come back to the House in the only way they can properly come—upon reports from the conference committee showing disagreement between the two Houses, so that a vote can be taken here—I suggest the true plan is to adopt the motion of non-concurrence. Otherwise the conferees would be put at a disadvantage.

Mr. KING. The motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky covers that. That is what we have been wanting to do all the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I renew my motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to understand if any agreement has been arrived at. If so, I want to except one proposition. It was understood we were going to pass separately upon each of these propositions and settle them so far as the conference was concerned between the two Houses. We have now acted upon one of them and settled it by removing it from conference. If the action of the committee is ratified by the House that takes Hennepin out of the conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then what is the use of this vote? I thought we were testing the sense of the committee and of this House so as to instruct the conferees when they went to deliberate. If that is not what we are doing, what are we doing?

Mr. WILLIS. We are trying to non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the House has agreed to that much of the Senate bill and taken it out of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as the Hennepin Canal matter is concerned the battle has only begun.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I renew the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN].

I have not occupied the attention of the House or the committee for, I believe, a single minute in the discussion of the river and harbor bill, and I now renew the amendment of my colleague that I may have the opportunity of talking upon this subject only for the brief term of five minutes. It strikes me that this legislation is anomalous. It presents some extraordinary features. The House passed the river and harbor bill appropriating for a very large number of rivers and harbors and breakwaters, and I believe for the improvement of some existing canals. That bill went to the Senate. It has been returned from the Senate with an amendment striking out every line of the original bill and returning to us, in the shape of an amendment, an entirely new proposition. The Senate has added some subjects not contained in the original bill.

It has added something to the amount of appropriations contained in the bill. It has taken off, I believe, in some instances a portion of the appropriations made in that bill. And after it has considered patiently, considered maturely, deliberated upon the necessities of this kind of service, only appropriating in each particular instance so much as that body supposed was demanded by the exigency of the case—for I take it for granted that in the judgment of that body it appropriated no more for any particular river or harbor than was needed by it for the purpose of making the proposed improvement—but after having gone over this whole field, embracing three hundred and fifty-five subjects, it then proposes to reduce the whole lump by reducing the appropriations 25 per cent. It is an acknowledgment, it seems to me, that in the original appropriations as they were considered there is an extravagance of at least 25 per cent.

And it is because of these extravagances that I have at all times refused to vote for river and harbor appropriations. I have, however, another serious objection to this bill. It proposes to buy from private corporations some old canals that have ceased, I presume, to be profitable to their owners; it proposes to buy breakwaters from private corporations. It not only proposes to improve the three hundred and fifty-five subjects of the bill, natural water ways as I suppose, but it proposes to enter into the purchase of old improvements and also to inaugurate some new ones. I do not mean the inauguration of improvements upon the natural water ways, but the inauguration of a system of internal improvements. Gentlemen talk about the necessity of having a competitor with the railroad corporations in the matter of freight. I remember that a few years ago Indiana entered upon a system of internal improvements which came very near bankrupting the State, and, rich as this nation is, great as are its revenues and its sources of wealth, you are entering upon a system which, if not arrested, may bankrupt this magnificent Republic of ours. You are introducing that system upon this bill. This is the beginning of it, and what we do here is to be used as a precedent for what is to come hereafter.

It is not the Hennepin Canal that I am opposed to; it is the system under which it is to be built; it is the precedent that will be established; for when you have made the Hennepin Canal, Indiana will come here and ask that its old canal across to the Ohio River shall be purchased and that the contents of the national Treasury shall be emptied out to pay for the construction of that important highway for the commerce of that State and of the Northwest. And so with other States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my colleague [Mr. BROWNE] withdraw his motion?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee seem to acquiesce in the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] in regard to the important amendments put upon this bill by the Senate, which are entirely new propositions; but as to the propositions which are not new, but simply amended by the Senate, they seem to stand upon a different ground. Now, the Senate has made very important changes in the provisions of the House bill in regard to the improvements of the Mississippi River from the head of the passes to Cairo. It seems to me, therefore, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or rather the conferees on the part of the House, will wish instructions upon that subject, and I hope that they will have the benefit of instructions. I think the sentiment of the House is that the Mississippi River Commission shall be dispensed with, and that a part of the works in progress on the river shall be completed so as to test the efficiency of the plan. I, therefore, submit an amendment to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to concur in the Senate amendment with the following amendment, to wit: Strike out all of the Senate amendment after the word "war," in line 1405, down to and including the word "banks," in line 1435, and insert the following:

"Improving Mississippi River from the head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio: Continuing improvement, $2,250,000; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of war."

Mr. HOLMAN. In order that the meaning of this amendment may be fully understood, I ask that the portion of the Senate amendment which it is proposed to strike out be read for the information of the House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman state whether it leaves the proposition just as it stood in the House bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does, except in this: The House expressly provided that the work should not be done under the supervision of the Mississippi River Commission, while the Mississippi River Commission is entirely omitted from the amendment.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the gentleman's statement will obviate the necessity of reading the portion of the amendment that is to be struck out.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all, because the committee will see when it is read that the Senate have gone entirely away from anything that was germane to that portion of the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senate have simply restored the clause as it has always been in the river and harbor bill.

The portion of the amendment proposed to be struck out was read, as follows:

In accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission: Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands or private property by overflows: Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel: And provided further, That the expenditure of so much of said appropriation as may be required to continue the improvement of Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches shall be confined to the complete repair and maintenance of the levees throughout said reaches to the height of 2 feet above the flood of 1882, and to the completion of the permeable works of contraction to such extent as may be required to bring the high-water banks of the river to the comparative uniformity of width contemplated in the first five paragraphs of the plan of improvement recommended by the Mississippi River Commission and adopted by Congress in 1880, and more fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of War for 1881, volume 2, part 3, page 2733: And provided further, That no works of bank protection or revetment shall be executed in said reaches or elsewhere until after it shall be found that the completion of the permeable contracting works and uniform width of the high-water channel will not secure the desired stability of the river banks.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that this proposition of mine is not in proper form, and I therefore withdraw the proposition "to concur with the following amendment," and offer what I now send to the desk as an amendment, simply striking out and inserting. I ask that the amendment be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the Senate amendment after the word "war," in line 1405, down to the word "banks," in line 1435, and insert the following:

"Provided, That the money appropriated by this act for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, except so much thereof as shall be necessary to expend in preventing the works in progress on other portions of the river from waste and injury, shall be expended in the continuation and completion of the works on the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches of the river now in progress of improvement, as established by the Mississippi River Commission, to the end that the proposed improvement of said two reaches of the river on which the works are in progress shall be completed at an early day and the plan of said commission for the improvement of the navigation of the river fully tested."

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be seen that the last provision inserted by the Senate is not interfered with by the proposed amendment; the improvements provided for at Vicksburg, Memphis, Columbus, Ky., New Orleans, and other points are left as proposed by the Senate.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, it is strange to me that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and others who are opposed to this bill and who are seeking to destroy it, after they have found they were about to be "hoist by their own petard" on the plan of procedure which they had adopted, should have surrendered everything else to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors except this item in relation to the Mississippi River. I do not know whether the Mississippi River is too little for improvement or too big for improvement. It is clear at all events that it is to be strangled.

Now, the committee is a little confused as to the effect of these votes which we are taking. We must keep in mind that we have but one Senate amendment before us; that if all these different items are amendments, then a failure to change one or a vote of the House agreeing to it, as we voted on the Hennepin Canal, takes that out of conference. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] shakes his head. I think perhaps it will go to the conference anyhow; and then the vote amounts to nothing.

The gentleman from Indiana says that he wants the committee of conference instructed. That would violate all the proprieties of a conference. Senators coming to confer with the managers on the part of the House would refuse to confer in such a case, because by instruction the freedom of conference is destroyed. Our managers should go into conference free, untrammeled, uninstructed. They should meet the Senatorial managers in a free conference.

The House passed a bill with certain provisions; the Senate amended it. All that is to be done is to concur or non-concur with or without amendment; and this effort here to throttle and strangle and smother the Mississippi River item is not fair or just or right. The motion of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to send the whole mass into conference non-concurred in is the only proper, logical, sensible course. I call upon the friends of the bill to stand by the chairman of the committee and absolutely vote down any and all amendments, thus sending the whole bill into conference.

I have confidence in the chairman of the committee and those who may be chosen as managers with him on the part of the House. I know that they understand, after the ten days or two weeks' consideration which we had of this bill, what the sense of the House is; or if they have forgotten it, all they have to do is to refer to that debate; for substantially all the items sent here by the Senate as amendments were considered in Committee of the Whole in the form of amendments offered to the House bill. The House voted upon nearly or quite all of them. There is but one logical course; and that is to stand by the chairman of the committee and vote down every amendment offered, and send the whole measure into conference. I have no doubt that the chairman of the committee and his co-managers will bring back to the House all that they are satisfied does not meet the concurrence of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. The Senate has amended materially the bill as it went from the House. It has made a radical change in the provision relating to the Mississippi River. Now, in order that the bill may get into conference as soon as possible, I suggest that this amendment take the same course adopted with reference to other amendments.

I want an opportunity to vote upon it. I may be mistaken, but my impression and belief are that if the work of constructing these levees could be done for nothing it had better not be done at all. It will cost at least $100,000,000 to construct them, and probably $10,000,000 annually thereafter to maintain them.

Mr. DUNN. There is no authority for that estimate of their cost. No estimate ever exceeded $20,000,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have only stated my opinion. I want a chance to vote on this question, and I prefer that it take the same course that has been adopted with the other amendments, with the understanding that we shall have an opportunity to vote upon it when the question comes back.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that this subject shall come to the House in such a form as to give the House a vote on this proposition, I do not insist upon a vote now.

Mr. WILLIS. The great body of this amendment of the Senate—two thirds of it—is identical with what the House passed. It therefore does not stand upon the same footing with the four or five other matters which have been mentioned. I beg the gentleman to let the matter go, assuring him that the committee will endeavor to reach an adjustment satisfactory to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] must see that here there is a proposed application of money directly and immediately to the building of levees.

Mr. DUNN. For the improvement of navigation.

Mr. WILLIS. So there is in the House bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know; but that is conditional; here it is direct. It is this new matter which I am proposing to strike out; I am not proposing to interfere with the remainder. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] will consent that this subject be reported back in such a form that an expression of the House can be had upon it, I will of course withdraw my amendment with great pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the gentleman, on examining the bill, will find that he is entirely mistaken; that this proposition in regard to levees is identical, "upon all fours," with the proposition as passed by the House. I ask him to turn to page 46 of the bill as passed by the House and compare it with page 121 of the bill as sent from the Senate. If I am not mistaken he will find that the two bills in this respect are indentical.

Mr. HOLMAN. The words to which I desire to call the gentleman's attention are these:

That the expenditure of so much of said appropriation as may be required to continue the improvement of Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches shall be confined to the complete repair and maintenance of the levees throughout said reaches to the height of 2 feet above the flood of 1882, and to the completion of the permeable works of contraction to such extent as may be required to bring the high-water banks of the river to the comparative uniformity of width contemplated in the first five paragraphs of the plan of improvement recommended by the Mississippi River Commission and adopted by Congress in 1880, and more fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of War for 1881, volume 2, part 3, page 2733.

It is this portion of the amendment to which I especially object and which I am seeking especially to strike out.

Mr. KING. You object to everything that improves the Mississippi River.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have more interest in the work than you have and my constituents have more interest than you have.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out the last word. [Cries of "Vote!"] I wish to correct the statement made by the gentlemon from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and I call his attention—— [Cries of "Vote!"] He says to get these new banks would require one hundred millions of money. There are no official figures to that effect in any report made by the Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think General Comstock has so reported.

Mr. KING. Allow me a moment. The highest figure of any commission having this matter in charge is $11,000,000. Why do you then try to prejudice the minds of the House by making these extravagant statements when there is no foundation for them?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Did not General Comstock report that it might cost that?

Mr. KING. No; he does not state anything of the kind.

Mr. DUNN. Nowhere can anything of the kind be found.

Mr. KING. It comes from your own mind.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It has been stated it might cost $7,000,000. I would also correct the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that $8,000,000 have already been spent. It should be less than $2,000,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it not understood that this is submitted to the conference committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; the gentleman from Kentucky declines to have this go before them.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Kentucky neither declines nor accepts the proposition.

Mr. KING. It will be governed by the rules of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not force us to a vote which may instruct the conference committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. When conference reports come in during the last days of the session there will be no difference.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let this take the same course.

Mr. WILLIS. Does he want a vote on the Hennepin Canal to be considered as an instruction to the conference committee as it is by the friends of that measure?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is an instruction to the committee of conference and is so regarded, and rightly so regarded.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not force another vote which may embarrass the committee by its being insisted upon as an instruction to the committee of conference.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. PAYSON. Let it be read again. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 106.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, 30 only voting in favor thereof.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HEWITT. I move to strike out of the Senate amendment the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving New York Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement to secure a 30-foot channel at mean low water at the Sandy Hook entrance of the harbor, upon such plan as the Secretary of War may approve, $750,000.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Chairman, the estimates contain the recommendation of $42,000,000. Among them I do not find any recommendation for improvement of the depth of water in the Sandy Hook channel. If the engineers had known of any practicable mode by which that improvement could be executed there is no question when they recommended $42,000,000 they would have put in a loose million for New York Harbor. But the truth is, they did not know how to do it, and they did not recommend it. The New York delegation, when this was under consideration, made no recommendation of any amendment on that subject.

The Senate have inserted an amendment in the bill providing an expenditure of $750,000, with a single provision that it shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Two years ago when I brought this matter to the notice of the House I secured, or rather the House adopted, an amendment by which $30,000 was appropriated to survey the harbor of New York. In this bill as it left the House $8,000 is appropriated in order to complete that survey. Until that survey is done no living man can tell how or where to spend the money in the harbor of New York. It is a problem that must be determined in advance. Of course we want a 30-foot channel. The steamboats built during the last year could load down 4 feet deeper than they do now if we had a 30-foot channel for that harbor; but the only effect of devoting this money at this time in the manner contemplated by the Senate amendment will be to put it in the hands of men to be expended without any definite plans or without any positive knowledge of the needs of that great harbor.

This is the view taken by the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York. They do not ask for the money. They do ask that the channel be deepened, but first that a competent board shall be created to determine how the amount of money shall be expended; how the improvement may be best made, and then they will come and ask an appropriation to carry it out.

Such a bill is now pending or has actually passed the other body and is coming to the House; and I entreat the House not to put this amount of money at the disposal of officers who are not clear as to how they would expend it, although they would be compelled, under the terms of the law, to do so. Therefore I have moved to strike out this portion of the Senate amendment and trust it will be concurred in by the House.

Mr. BAYNE was recognized.

Mr. KING. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HEWITT. Has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought that the gentleman had yielded the floor. He has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. HEWITT. Then I yield cheerfully for a question.

Mr. KING. Is it not contemplated that the present appropriation shall not go into effect until that commission has reported on the plan?

Mr. HEWITT. On the contrary, there is no such commission whatever. If there had been such a commission it would have changed my views as to the character of the proposition.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Has not the gentleman confidence in the Secretary of War and his ability to spend the money to good advantage?

Mr. HEWITT. The Secretary of War does not know anything about the best mode of improving the harbor, and without the report of such a board would not know how to expend the money.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I think he is as competent to give an opinion upon the matter as the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT. I do not pretend to be competent. Do not make any mistake. No, I am not competent; and do not assert that I am. But to put that money in the hands of the present officers, who have not submitted to this House any definite plan for its expenditure, would in my opinion be just a waste of so much money.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the harbor of New York belongs to the whole country. All our people are interested in it. The people of the Far West and the Middle States and all over the world in fact are interested in the great harbor of New York. Complaint came before our committee of the inefficiency of the water channel for vessels of large draught floating into that harbor. It was made manifest to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that there should be an improvement of the harbor. It was doubtless made manifest also to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate that an appropriation should be made to give a 30-foot channel into that harbor. That is the reason the appropriation was inserted. We put in as well as we knew how, in the bill as it passed the committee, a large appropriation for New York Harbor. The Senate saw fit to go a step farther and appropriate $750,000 upon a plan to be approved by the Secretary of War; and it is to be presumed, with the assistant engineers of the Army and with responsible and trustworthy officers, and with such an official at the head of the Department as the Secretary of War, that the money will be judiciously expended in the interests of the commerce of the country.

I am surprised that a Representative from the city of New York should undertake, by objecting to such an appropriation, to do away with an improvement in his own State for the benefit of his own city as well as for the benefit of the commerce of the whole country. I do not know what it means unless it be to relieve the President of the United States from an obligation which this would impose upon him when he comes to consider this bill. The President himself is likely to realize the importance of the harbor of New York. He is likely to know that a 30-foot channel there would afford sufficient draught of water for large vessels, and that it is a matter of importance to the people of this country; and I am disposed to think if he came to consider that proposition it would probably influence favorable action upon this bill, because this appropriation, if any appropriation in the bill is justified by the facts, is warranted by the importance of the harbor on account of the commerce that comes in and out of it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, all laws allowing entries for timber culture, and all laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DOLPH, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. COCKRELL the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also furnished the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1042) to pay B. S. James for transporting the United States mails.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two House thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HEWITT. I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says he is not able to understand how a member from New York could get up here in his place and refuse to take money which is to be expended in his district and in his State. I can understand how the gentleman from Pennsylvania comes to such a conclusion; for he was never known to resist any measure which proposed to spend money in the State of Pennsylvania and in his district. When I rose in my place in this House and resisted his proposition to buy out the Monongahela navigation he denounced me then for going into his district and interfering with the interests of the State of Pennsylvania. Now he has come into my district and is interfering with the interests of the State of New York and of the people of New York. He proposes to thrust $750,000 down our throats, which may ruin our noble harbor by the expenditure of that amount in ignorance of all the conditions of the problem.

This is no new matter. It is a curious fact that nature has been more powerful than man in preserving the entrance to the harbor of New York. There is to-day in the channel 1 foot more water than there was in the time of the Revolutionary war. It is due to the fact that three great currents have steadily scoured out the channel, in spite of the shoaling in spots produced by the dumping of garbage in places where it is forbidden by municipal law.

But nature has not kept up with the size of the steamships. We want 30 feet. There are three channels: Gedney's, the longest; the Swash Channel; and the third, the East Channel. No man can say to-day which of those channels can be best improved to accommodate ships carrying 30 feet of water. It is that information we want. We do not want to stop the improvement. It is necessary for the interests of the gentleman's constituents; it is necessary for the commerce of this country. But in view of the fact that great harbors have been ruined by injudicious expenditures, I think I voice the opinion of the Chamber of Commerce and the shipping merchants of New York not to allow injudicious appropriations to be made before we get the knowledge that is necessary for the improvement of the harbor, and then put the work under a competent board, as was done thirty years ago when the works now in existence for New York Harbor were devised and carried out by a board composed of Totten, Bache, and Davis, the most eminent engineers of their day.

This meets with the approbation of the Navy Department. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Navy which states the whole case, and which I read as a portion of my remarks:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, July 9, 1886.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of June 22, concerning the bill (S. 2157) now before Congress for the preservation of New York Harbor, and requesting an expression of opinion from me on that important subject.

The Navy Department naturally takes a great interest in questions which affect the port of New York, believing these questions to be national rather than local in their character. The commerce of the port of New York is in a great measure the commerce of the nation, and whatever affects that port can not fail to be felt by that Department of the General Government whose ships and fleets must in peace and war use and defend its channels and entrances.

In 1855, to supply a need similar to the present, a board of harbor commissioners, appointed by the President of the United States, served with great efficiency at New York. This board was composed of Totten, of the United States Engineers, Davis, of the Navy, and Bache, of the Coast Survey. Its decisions, made after careful examination and deliberation, gave thorough satisfaction to those interested in the future of New York, and have been the principal guides in the management of the physical features of the harbor during the thirty years which have elapsed since that board was dissolved. As a result of their careful consideration of harbor questions, these eminent officers left on record this significant declaration, as follows:

"Accordingly we unite with the memorialists of the Merchants' Exchange and the majority of the committee on commerce and navigation in condemning the irresponsible course which has hitherto been pursued in relation to the harbor, and in approving the appointment of a responsible body like the present commission, to the end that what remains of the harbor may be preserved for the benefit of the increasing commerce of the port."

Time has only shown the justice of this board's conclusions. The port, needing constant improvement to accommodate more and larger vessels, has, on the contrary, been steadily injured by the various artificial causes, against which nature has struggled in vain. Tidal lands have been unwisely reclaimed, injudicious dumping laws have succeeded others as injurious, and even these unwise laws have been largely evaded by the lazy and dishonest.

The Army engineers in charge of the improvements of the harbor have during these thirty years worked with their well-known ability; the pilot commissioners have striven earnestly to arrest the downward progress of affairs; while the merchants of New York have on more than one occasion sought relief from Congress; but the divided jurisdiction of the harbor, the lack of Congressional interest, and, above all, the absence of any permanent board or commission have rendered all efforts useless.

The Navy Department, having kept itself advised at all times of the maritime value of New York Harbor, is convinced that the only hope for maintaining and increasing that value lies in the immediate establishment of a harbor board, which shall combine the expert knowledge of the Army engineers, the Navy and the Coast Survey, together with a proper representation of the New York and New Jersey citizenship. This board, established permanently, would have a weight with the cities and States bordering upon New York Bay and with Congress the importance of which can not be overestimated.

The Navy Department, therefore, heartily concurs in the wish of New York citizens that the bill (S. 2157) reported from the Committee on Commerce to the Senate by Senator MILLER should become a law.

I am, gentlemen, with much respect, yours, very truly,

W. C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon CORNELIUS N. BLISS,
Hon. A. FOSTER HIGGINS,
Of the Chamber of Commerce, New York City.

So I stand here on behalf of my constituents. I think they know what they want, and I think I know what they ought to have. They have not asked for this money. I do ask that it be withheld, but I ask the House to pass the bill which has come over from the Senate to give us a competent board to determine what we need and what it will cost and how it can best be expended. [Applause.] After that is done, we shall hope to get all the money we need.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I deem it proper to say in one sentence, that when this matter came before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors we had a communication from the Chamber of Commerce of New York stating that all they wanted was a sufficient sum to survey these three channels, and that sum to the last cent the committee allowed.

Mr. HEWITT. That is true.

Mr. WILLIS. But I am informed that after the bill went to the Senate the Chief of Engineers presented there some facts and views which had not been submitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and upon his statement that he had arrived at a plan which would give New York a better harbor this appropriation was put in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to strike out this provision.

The question was taken, and the Chairman stated that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 61.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have not time to divide by tellers before the hour for adjournment.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the Senate amendments to the river and harbor appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I report from the Committee of Ways and Means a privileged resolution; giving notice that I shall call it up to-morrow.

The resolution was read, as follows:

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MORRISON. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not adopt that resolution. It is very clear that we can not be ready to adjourn at the time named.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1937) authorizing the city of Salem to construct a bridge across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon, and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERMANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD BRIDGE ACROSS SAINTE MARIE RIVER.

Mr. GILFILLAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6104) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sainte Marie River, and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. CRISP. Unless some gentleman desires the reading in full of each of these bills, I suggest that they might generally be passed upon a reading of the title. While they are not of course identical in terms, the committee in each case has sought to protect the interests of navigation and to avoid monopoly by permitting all railroad companies to use the bridge upon reasonable terms. We are not now calling up any bill to which, so far as we know, there is objection. These are bills which, according to the understanding of the committee, are unobjected to.

In every case, Mr. Speaker, where a bill will be called up under this order the provisions are approved by the Secretary of War after report thereon by the Engineer Department. I only make this suggestion in the interest of economy of time and to save the clerks in the reading of the bills.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I see no objection to that. Let that rule, however, be applied to each bill as it comes along. If no objection is made the particular bill need not be read.

Mr. CRISP. I desire to be understood if any gentleman desires to have any bill read he can do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and unless the reading of a bill is requested it will only be read by the title.

The Chair will state there are several amendments proposed to this bill. At least one is a new section, which perhaps the Clerk had better read.

Mr. GILFILLAN. There is one substantial amendment, and one formal amendment simply changing the number of a section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments proposed as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That whereas Congress by an act to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sainte Marie River, approved July 8, 1882, did authorize the Sault Sainte Marie Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, to build a bridge across the said Sainte Marie River at or near the rapids in said river, in said Chippewa County, in the State of Michigan, therefore the provisions of the said act of July 8, 1882, as well as the provisions of this act, are hereby amended and qualified by the following provisions of this act, namely: At any time after the passage of this act the said Sault Sainte Marie Bridge Company may proceed, under said act of July 8, 1882, or the said Minneapolis, Sault Sainte Marie and Atlantic Railway Company may proceed, under this act, or both of said companies may so proceed, to prepare and submit to the Secretary of War for his approval a drawing and description showing the plan and location for its bridge, but the Secretary of War shall in the first instance approve but one such location and plan; and if the company whose location and plan shall be so approved shall proceed with due diligence to enter upon and prosecute to completion the construction of such bridge, no other location or plan shall be approved by the Secretary of War and no other bridge shall be built under either act; but if such construction shall not be so entered upon and prosecuted, then the Secretary of War may withdraw and cancel such approval and approve a second location and plan; it being the intention of Congress that the interests of commerce, including the transportation by water as well as on land, shall be kept in view, and to that end only one bridge shall be constructed at or near said point.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. With regard to that bill I desire to ask whether my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] was consulted in reference to it?

Mr. GILFILLAN. He is a member of the committee, and gave his consent to it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes; I was consulted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move, in section 3, lines 12 and 13, to strike out the words "except when trains are passing over the same;" so it will read:

And the said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats and vessels, but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening said draw during or after the passage of trains.

The bill as drawn provides for the erection of a draw, and that it shall be opened upon reasonable signal "except when trains are passing over the same." Until the Arthur Kill bill was passed by the House those words have not occurred in any bill passed by this or any other Congress. The example there set seems to have been imitated in this bill. It is, in my judgment, a pernicious example. I believe navigation should have the right of way; and therefore I have moved to strike out these words, which have not been included in any other bill this evening.

Mr. GILFILLAN. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You can not open a draw when there is a train upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say the commerce passing through the Sault Sainte Marie Canal is very great and grows greater every year. The Secretary of War objected to putting bridges there on account of detriment to commerce. He said provision should be made that the draw should be open except when trains are passing. This provision has been embraced on the recommendation of the Secretary. We all understand that it occupies some time to turn a draw. The train dispatchers will always know when trains are approaching. It has been included in the interest of navigation. A very great number of vessels are passing at all times. Therefore I believe it would be a mistake to strike out the words referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GILFILLAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES, CUMBERLAND AND CANEY FORK RIVERS, TENNESSEE.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Commerce I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9793) to amend an act approved March 3, 1885, to authorize the construction of bridges across the Cumberland and Caney Fork Rivers, in Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from its further consideration and consider it in the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will state briefly, so as to save the time occupied in reading the bill, that the object of this bill is to correct an error in the title of the road to which this privilege was granted by the original bill. The gentleman who wrote me at the close of the last session of Congress failed to give the exact title of the railroad company. This bill amends the former act in that respect. It also authorizes that company, or any other company with which it may consolidate, and also the Nashville and Knoxville Railroad Company, to construct and maintain a bridge over the Cumberland River, near Carthage, Smith County, Tennessee.

It also allows the railroad company, or either of them at its option, to construct a wagon, horse, and foot-passenger bridge, whereas the former act made it mandatory. The committee report unanimously in favor of the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the last vote taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS SAINT AUGUSTINE AND LAZARETTO CREEKS, GEORGIA.

Mr. CRISP. I ask to call up the bill (H. R. 8967) to authorize the building of railroad bridges across Saint Augustine and Lazaretto Creeks, in the State of Georgia.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the last vote taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, MONTANA.

Mr. CRISP. I now call up the bill (H. R. 7851) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in Montana. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of this bill and put it upon its passage.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 32 of the second section, after the word "spans," strike out the words "shall not be of less elevation in any case than 50 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than 200 feet in length, and the main spans shall be over the main channel of the river and not less than 200 feet in length."

And insert the words:

Shall be of such elevation and the spans of said bridge of such length as the Secretary of War may direct.

Also, in the same section, in the forty-fifth line of the printed bill, strike out the words "not less than one hundred feet" and insert the words "such width."

Also, in line 47, after the word "draw," insert "as the Secretary of War may direct."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the last vote taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

Mr. CRISP. I now call up the bill (S. 63) from the House Calendar to authorize the construction of a highway bridge across that part of the waters of Lake Champlain lying between the towns of North Hero and Alburg, in the State of Vermont.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BELLINGHAM BAY RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. CRISP. I now call up the bill (S. 236) to authorize the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges in the Territory of Washington.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the last vote taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS YOUNG'S BAY, OREGON.

Mr. CRISP. I now call up the bill (H. R. 4670) granting to the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, the right to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in said county and State, with Senate amendments.

I am directed by the committee to move concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 of the printed bill strike out after the word "Oregon," in the third line, the words "(1) and its court and duly authorized officers and agents, in the name of said county and under the authority of said court, are."

Also, in line 7 of the first section of the bill insert, after the word "State" the words "(2) at such point as said county may select and may be approved by the Secretary of War."

Also, in the same section, in the thirteenth line, after the word "prescribe" insert "(3) and also to construct, establish, and maintain a bridge across Skipanon Creek, in the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, by permanent embankment or otherwise, as the Secretary of War may approve."

Also, in the twenty-first line of the first section, strike out after the word "said" the word "bridge" and insert "bridges."

Also, in the second section, in the eleventh and twelfth lines, strike out the word "bridge" where it occurs in each line and insert the word "bridges."

Also, in line 14, in the same section, after the word "bay" insert "and creek."
Also, in line 18 of the same section, insert after the word "bridge" "across Young's Bay."
Also, in the same section, line 31, after the word "floats" insert "also showing the Skipanon Creek to the head of usual navigation."
Also, in section 3, after the word "bay," insert the words "and said creek," and strike out in the same line the word "bridge" and insert "bridges."
Also, strike out in line 5, of section 3, the word "its" before the word "accessory;" and in lines 6 and 7 of the same section strike out the word "bridge" where it occurs in each line and insert the word "bridges."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE AT SHEFFIELD, ALA.

Mr. CRISP. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8978) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River at or near Sheffield, Ala., and for other purposes. I ask that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE AT PADUCAH, KY.

Mr. CRISP. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3768) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at Paducah, Ky.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia what is the height of the bridge provided by this bill.

Mr. CRISP. This is an act authorizing the construction of this bridge under the general law for bridging the Ohio River, which prescribes the heights, with an amendment to that general law. The only change made in the general law is as to the cities in which the advertisement shall be published of the approval of the plans by the Secretary of War. Gentlemen who are familiar with the general law will recollect and know it provides for an advertisement in the newspapers having a circulation in certain cities of the approval of the plans by the Secretary of War. This reduces the number of cities in which the publication is to be advertised. I am not certain whether the reduction is from six to three or not, but it can be ascertained from the report. That is the only change. There is no change in the general law as to bridging the Ohio River.

The Committee on Commerce recommended the following amendment.

In line 15, after "1872," insert "and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 14, 1883."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS TRADEWATER RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 9895) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tradewater River by the Ohio Valley Railway Company.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE AT CAIRO, ILL.

Mr. CRISP. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9728) to authorize the Chicago, Saint Louis and New Orleans Railroad Company and the Illinois Central Railroad Company, or either of them, to construct a bridge over the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from its further consideration, and that it be considered in the House.

Mr. PRICE. Before we consent to that I would like to ask the gentleman what is the height of this bridge?

Mr. CRISP. I was about to make a statement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the bill had better be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in part.

Mr. TOWNSHEND (interrupting the reading). As the remainder of the bill consists of details that are not important I withdraw the demand for the further reading of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the attention of the House for a moment to this bill. The Engineer Department in reporting upon its provisions recommended that the height of this bridge be fixed at 53 feet above high-water mark. The committee authorized me to report the bill some time ago with a provision for a bridge 45 feet above high-water mark and the bill is so reported. On yesterday at a meeting of the committee I was instructed to submit an amendment fixing the height at 53 feet, the height recommended by the engineers and by the War Department. I therefore move to amend in the second section at the ninth line by striking out "forty-five" and inserting "fifty-three."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the height I believe that is prescribed by the general law.

Mr. CRISP. And recommended by the Department in this particular case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DUNN). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to that amendment, and I desire to give my reasons. It is true, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has stated, that the engineers' report upon this proposed bridge was that it should be 53 feet above high-water mark. The Committee on Commerce decided to report in favor of 45 feet above high-water mark, and I will read an extract from the committee's report. They say:

The act above mentioned requires that all bridges over the Ohio below the mouth of the Big Sandy should be 53 feet above the highest water mark, and in this case the committee have concluded that 45 feet above the highest water mark is sufficient to accommodate the commerce of the Ohio River, and is all that should be required of the commerce going over the bridge, for the following reasons.

Then they go on and speak of the lands that have been granted by the States of Kentucky and Illinois for the construction of bridges, railroads, &c.

According to the engineers' report there are now only ten boats running on the Ohio River which can not at any stage of water pass under a bridge 45 feet above the highest water mark at Cairo. Those ten boats can pass every day, except, on an average, twelve days in the year. That has been the case for the last eighteen years; that is, there have been but twelve days on an average in each of the last eighteen years when those ten boats could not have passed under a bridge 45 feet above the highest water mark, and those ten are the only boats running on the river that require so great a height.

For twenty-four days in every year, on an average, for the last eighteen years, these boats could not pass under the bridge at Louisville, which shows that the Louisville bridge is much lower than this proposed bridge at Cairo.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And yet the Louisville bridge is 53 feet.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All bridges below the mouth of the Big Sandy are required by the general law to be 53 feet above high-water mark.

Mr. DUNHAM. I see by reference to the report that the Louisville bridge is 39.56 feet.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That bridge is at the falls; but they have a canal through which the boats go.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is true. Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that no boats are being built at this time to run on that river of the height of the ten to which I have referred, and it is reasonable to expect, according to all past experience, that within the next ten years those ten boats will disappear. They will be sunk, or will explode their boilers, or will disappear in some way, and when that comes to pass there will be no boats upon that river that can not go under a bridge 45 feet above the highest water mark.

I am told by good authority here that the difference in cost between building this bridge 45 feet above high-water mark and making it 53 feet will be in the neighborhood of $500,000. Those gentlemen here who know anything about Cairo know that it is a very bad place to build a bridge, one of the worst places anywhere on the river. The Illinois Central Railroad Company are very anxious to build there for the benefit of the western, the southwestern, the northwestern country, and necessarily also for the benefit of the whole eastern country, but they do not wish to be compelled to construct a more expensive bridge than is necessary. As to the business, every man who has examined the question knows that the tendency of the commerce upon the rivers is to decrease and that the tendency of the commerce upon the railroads is to increase. There is no doubt about that. To show how the commerce carried on the railroads is increasing and how the commerce carried on the water is decreasing I will read another extract from the report of the committee. They say:

In the year 1881 the number of all craft touching at Cairo (including the Ohio River craft) was 3,583 with a tonnage of 1,469,151 tons; in 1885 the number was 1,583 with tonnage of 970,702 tons (including Ohio River tonnage). In 1885 1,583 Ohio boats of 482,000 tons landed at Cairo, and 79 boats passed without landing, showing a tremendous decrease in the half decade. The railroad tonnage increased from 1,134,507 tons in 1881 to 1,346,151 tons in 1885. (Wharf-master's reports, Cairo.) In 1884 the Illinois Central Railroad transferred by boat at Cairo 61,723 loaded freight cars and 8,000 passenger cars. These figures show to your committee that the commerce of the Ohio River is fast and steadily decreasing and the commerce of the railroad as fast and as steadily increasing; the one demanding less and the other greater facilities.

The Secretary of the Senate, Mr. McCOOK, appeared with a message from that body.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois will suspend to receive a message from the Senate.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I ask the Chair to decide it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. My point is that, under the order of the House providing for this evening session, nothing is in order but to act upon these bridge bills, and that therefore the receipt of a message from the Senate is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the reception of a message from the Senate or from the President is not the transaction of business; and this has heretofore been held very frequently in the House. For instance, even when the House is operating under an order for a call of the House, no motion being in order except a motion to adjourn or for some matter connected with the call, it has always been held that these messages could be received. The Chair overrules the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine; that the Senate requested a conference with the House on said bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MILLER, Mr. VAN WYCK, and Mr. GEORGE.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendments——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that could not be done now.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. HATCH (to Mr. DUNHAM). I supposed you would object.

Mr. DUNHAM. You may depend upon it I will.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER AT CAIRO.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. Now, for the reasons which I have stated, on account of the extra expense to which this railroad company would be subjected in building this bridge in accordance with the amendment of the committee, and in order that the bridge may be built as soon as possible, I hope that the House will vote down the amendment of the committee and accept the report as first made by them.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think it is only necessary for the House to understand the situation of this case in order that this amendment shall be adopted. A general law applying to the whole of the Ohio River below the mouth of the Big Sandy requires that all bridges be built at a height of 53 feet above high-water mark. I understand an argument was made before the Committee on Commerce, which was designed to convince them (and did convince them so thoroughly that they made this report), that 45 feet above high-water mark at Cairo is equal to 53 feet above high water at any other point on the Ohio River. That was the most singular argument I ever heard addressed to intelligent men. I do not see how any man could undertake to convince another that a height of 45 feet is equal to a height of 53 feet; yet a railroad attorney actually went before that committee and attempted to convince them that this was the truth.

Now, Cairo, as gentlemen here understand, is located at the mouth of the Ohio River. Gentlemen are well aware that millions of dollars have been spent in improving the Ohio River and the navigable waters emptying into it. After appropriating money to remove rocks and other obstructions to the navigation of that river, we are now asked to pass a bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across that river which will practically shut it up. This the Congress of the United States can not afford to do, because the owner of every single pound of freight upon the Ohio River and every river emptying into it is interested in having the navigation of the river unimpeded.

We have been told by the gentleman from Illinois that there are only ten boats which can not pass under a bridge 45 feet above high-water, and these ten boats are unable to do so, on the average, only twelve days in the year. He tells us also that the commerce of the river is gradually being reduced. Well, sir, if you build a few more low bridges across the Ohio River and some other rivers of this country, you will practically stop water transportation, and the whole transportation of the country will be in the hands of the railroads. That is exactly what we do not want. So far as I am concerned, I want to see a bridge built at Cairo. It is anticipated that a bridge across the river at Cairo will very largely benefit the people of my district. For this reason I wish to see the bridge built, but I do not wish to see it built at any height which will interfere with navigation.

There is now a bridge, 53 feet above high-water mark, at Henderson, Ky.; yet for nearly a month during this last spring the navigation of the river was very seriously interfered with by that bridge. We can not afford to authorize the construction of a bridge which will be less than 53 feet above high-water mark.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted, and that Congress will not countenance any effort to place any obstruction on the Ohio River or in any way to hinder its navigation. The gentleman said that the bridge at Louisville, which is only 39 feet above high-water mark, interferes with navigation. If that is true, why should we be guilty of the folly of authorizing another low bridge across the Ohio River, especially at its mouth, obstructing the navigation of that river and its tributaries, and very largely injuring the commerce of the river below. It would cut off to a very great extent the commerce which would otherwise go out of the Ohio River and down the Mississippi. I hope there will be no further objection to the amendment, and that it will be adopted without further discussion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a word, as I represent counties fronting on the Ohio River. I am informed that more money has been expended on the Ohio River in the improvement of its navigation than upon any other river in the Union, not even excepting the Mississippi River. The Ohio River bears more commerce upon its bosom annually than any other river west of the Alleghany Mountains except the Mississippi River.

The general law has forbidden any bridge to be constructed below Cincinnati less than 53 feet high. The bridges below Cincinnati have conformed to that general law with the exception of the bridge at the Falls of the Ohio River at Louisville.

If this bridge is allowed to be built at Cairo at a height of 45 feet it will seriously obstruct the navigation of that river and will do injustice to those who have been compelled to construct at greatly increased cost high bridges above Cairo at Henderson and other points below Cincinnati. I am as desirous as my colleague can possibly be to see a bridge thrown across the river at Cairo, but I am not willing any bridge shall be constructed at the mouth of the Ohio which will interrupt the navigation of that river. For that reason I wish the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee. That amendment, as has been stated by the gentleman in charge of the bill, is one which the engineers recommended to be embraced in the bill, so as to avoid all danger of obstructing the important navigation of that river.

Mr. BYNUM. I simply desire, Mr. Speaker, the House shall fully understand this question. I have no special feeling myself in regard to the passage or non-passage of the measure. The gentleman from Kentucky did injustice in stating the committee had been led to believe a bridge 45 feet above high water was as high as one 53 feet above high water. The flood of 1884 was the greatest known, and a bridge constructed 45 feet above the high-water mark of that year would be almost as high as one constructed 53 feet above the high-water mark previous to the flood of 1883 or 1884.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That flood was phenominal.

Mr. BYNUM. Yes; it was phenominal. I was influenced by that statement of facts. The bank on either side of the Ohio River is low. As the gentleman from Illinois has said it will require greater expense. I can say to the House I know this company would rather have this amendment adopted to fix it at 53 feet than the bill should fail.

Since the bill has been reported the committee have received a communication from the chambers of commerce of New Orleans and Memphis protesting against the construction of this bridge. That is the influence which caused the committee to change its mind.

The Ohio River is the only great river running east and west. The floods in spring are much more likely to raise the water in that river than in rivers running north and south, as the flood enters the river at once. We know as the land is cleared up and drained floods become more frequent and of greater volume. We may not have floods often as great as that of 1883 or 1884, still they will be more frequent than heretofore.

Mr. CLARDY. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in the statement that while the river traffic has been decreasing the railroad traffic has been increasing. I regret that the information did not come to him before he presented the views of the minority against the Saint Louis bridge bill. It is said he wants a high bridge at Saint Louis and a low bridge at Cairo. Yes, he wants a high bridge at Saint Louis where we want a low one, and a low bridge across the Ohio where we ought to have a low one with a draw.

I wish to say a word in regard to high bridges. We have a high bridge at Saint Louis 50 feet above high water, and for three months and frequently for four months steamers from New Orleans and Memphis can not pass under the bridge by letting down their smoke-stacks. The almost universal sentiment among river-men is that a low bridge with a draw is preferable to a high bridge without one.

There are three low bridges on the Missouri River; my friend from Kansas knows something about them. They are 55 feet high, and yet I assert that they are positive obstructions to the commerce, or at least that they were obstructions when there was any commerce, on that river. Now, unless a bridge is in fact a high bridge——

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Like my bridge that I want to get through.

Mr. CLARDY. I repeat it would be much better to have a low bridge with a draw of 160 or 200 foot span, and that is the opinion and sentiment of the men who are engaged in navigating the river.

Mr. DUNHAM. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the gentleman from Missouri has said, that if I recollect aright, in the first place the report which I made, the minority report, on the Saint Louis bridge, was written before the report on the Cairo bridge.

Mr. CLARDY. Of course it was; it was before you got your information.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is all right; I am stating the exact facts in the case.

I want to say further, that I am advocating a bridge of 45 feet in height above the highest water ever known, and you want a bridge only 10 feet above.

Mr. CLARDY. I favor a draw.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is all I wanted to say.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the words "ninety-five" ought not also to be changed to "one hundred and three."

Mr. CRISP. In what line?

Mr. BAYNE. In the second section, eighth line.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That would necessarily follow.

Mr. BAYNE. These words, as now in the bill, might lead to some confusion and would depend altogether upon what construction was given to the words high and low water. It would become necessarily a matter of construction. The height at low water as well as at high water mark should be raised to make the bill correspond in that particular.

The river interests in Pittsburgh, and about it, have spoken to me about this bridge. They have no objection to its going up, but they want it constructed at least 53 feet above high water and the span not less than 500 feet in width. I see the bill provides for that, and if the amendment be adopted making it 53 feet above the high-water mark and 103 above low-water mark there will be no objection to it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There can be no objection to it in that event.

Mr. BAYNE. The allegation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] that the tonnage on that river is diminishing may be true; or it may be true that the number of craft that touch at Cairo have diminished in the last two or three years.

But the tonnage that is shipped from Pittsburgh, the quantity of coal which has gone down the river, has increased year by year. I do not know where these figures were obtained; I do not know where the committee got that information; but I do know that the quantity of coal running down the Ohio River is increasing each year and year after year, and that it is likely to increase to many more millions of bushels than are now annually sent.

The quantity of coal and coke sent down the Ohio River last year was about 84,000,000 bushels, and the quantity that will probably be sent this year will reach 90,000,000 bushels or upward, and this increase seems to run at from four to five or even as much as eight million bushels a year. It seems to be practically uniform in its increase. There is no doubt that it will send down over 100,000,000 bushels soon, and the best quality of coal there will supply those sections of the country bordering on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers for centuries to come. There is no reason in the world why that immense body of coal, being a heavy product, should not be shipped exclusively by water, and it will be so shipped as long as there are water ways to transport it.

I take it therefore to be the bounden duty of Congress to protect the navigation of that river, and to require that all bridges constructed over it shall be built with sufficiently wide spans and height above the water to allow craft to go through safely.

I therefore will insist upon the amendment, and hope the chairman of the committee will also amend line 8 by increasing it from 95 to 103 feet, so as to make the two provisions of the bill harmonize with each other in reference to high and low water.

Mr. CRISP. I do not care to discuss to the House the question as to what the height of this bridge should be. In the report is all the information the committee have. You have heard gentlemen who are particularly interested in the matter on both sides of the question; and I take it the House is prepared to vote on the amendment.

I think though the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a proper one. The amendment of the committee is to raise the height 8 feet more than the bill provides above local high water, and I see no reason why the same number of feet should not be added to 95, making it 103 feet above low water.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Why require a given height above both low and high water? That presumes that the difference is constant. There is no harm, of course, but I think when you have fixed a given low-water mark or high-water mark alone, it would give all that is needed.

Mr. CRISP. If no gentleman desires to discuss the amendment further I will ask the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I wish to be heard for a little while.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That does not shut off other amendments?

The SPEAKER. It would not prevent other amendments, as the Chair understands it is only applicable to the pending amendment.

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin a short time, if he wishes to be heard.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I do not apprehend that many of us are so much interested in the height of this particular bridge as in the general principle involved in the construction of low and high bridges on Western waters.

Statements have been made to this House which if uncontradicted would lead to misapprehension. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] told us on yesterday that the opposition to another and a low bridge arose chiefly or materially from the fact that certain individuals were hiring land at a cheap rent for lumber-yards, and that if the bridge was built they would be compelled to remove their lumber-yards or pay a higher price for their land. I beg to say the gentleman is deceived in his information and his statement would deceive the House if uncontradicted. It is not the case.

We have been told steamboat men, who ought to be considered in this matter, prefer a low bridge to a high bridge unless it be very high. That is barely possible. But I hold in my hand a list of protests by fourteen steamboat companies, running in the aggregate about sixty steamboats, all of them protesting in vigorous and unmistakable terms against the construction of any bridge below the mouth of the Missouri River unless it be a high bridge so that steamboats may pass under them by merely putting a joint into their smoke-stacks.

It is not true, as the information comes to me, that the steamboatmen on the Upper Mississippi River prefer a low bridge. It is true we have above the mouth of the Missouri River seventeen low bridges, and it is true also that every boat or raft that runs below either of them is damaged from $10 to $100. It is one of the inconveniences which commerce must submit to.

If you come to the question of abstract constitutional right no bridge can be authorized on any of the navigable streams of the Northwest. But it is true new interests have arisen which have to be subserved, and the Supreme Court, to meet the exigencies of the times and the altered conditions, decided a bridge was not an obstruction unless it was an impassable barrier; that it was only an impediment to be overcome by additional time or caution or prudence or skill or expenditure. Therefore we all consent to these seventeen bridges where the channels are not shifting and where, by a reasonable outlay of skill or money, we may pass them and thereby the tide of commerce is permitted to flow through. But when you come to the mouth of the Missouri—some have said the mouth of the Ohio—men familiar with these streams know when you come to the mouth of the Missouri the conditions are all changed. The river rolls out great mountains of sand and gravel and débris which deposit themselves anywhere, and no engineering skill can prevent it shutting up any channel at any draw which engineering skill may establish. The whole matter of the construction of these bridges below the mouth of the Missouri River is destructive of any principle which justifies any man in voting a dollar for the improvement of these water ways.

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM].

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not wish to detain the House. I simply wish to repeat this: That I believe as much as any gentleman in a high bridge. I believe a bridge 45 feet high above the highest water ever known in the Ohio River at Cairo is enough, especially when the engineers say, as I have stated before, there are but twelve boats on this river that can not go under a 45-foot bridge; and according to all the traditions of the river these boats after a very little time are sure to disappear.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. What particular height do the engineers recommend in this particular case?

Mr. DUNHAM. They recommend 53 feet for this bridge. The Committee on Commerce differed from the engineers and reported the bill, giving their various reasons for it, providing that this bridge should be but 45 feet above high-water mark. That was done for reasons which the gentleman from Nebraska understands and which it is not necessary for me to repeat. The committee have thought fit to recommend an amendment to make the height 53 feet.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. That would be in accordance with the recommendation of the engineers.

Mr. DUNHAM. So I stated. But I say that is unnecessarily high; for in ten years' time there will not be a boat on the Ohio River that will not be able to pass under a 45-foot bridge.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. And what are they going to do during those ten years?

Mr. DUNHAM. It will probably be as in the past ten years. There are only twelve days in the year that they can not go under a 45-foot bridge.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. And are you going to stop them on those twelve days?

Mr. DUNHAM. We hope not to have those floods which will stop them. I do not think it is necessary to compel the railroad company that seeks to develop the business of the North, the West, the East, and the South at an outlay of $3,000,000 to pay out $500,000 of unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Would the Illinois Central Railroad

Company rather be authorized to build this bridge with the amendment requiring it to be 53 feet high than to have the bill defeated?

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes, sir. The Illinois Central Railroad Company want to build this bridge, and they propose to build it even if it must be 53 feet high, but it is not reasonable to ask them to make it so high.

Mr. BUCHANAN. You would rather injure the boat-owners.

Mr. DUNHAM. Why, there are not boat-owners enough to injure.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has the floor.

Mr. CRISP. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri desire?

Mr. GLOVER. Five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, and then I shall ask a vote.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to notice in a few words the remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE]. Those remarks were really a side blow at a proposition not now before the House, but we have met that gentleman heretofore upon these propositions before the Committee on Commerce, where he had a full hearing, and where it was decided, notwithstanding the objections urged by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the interests of the world at large would not be prejudiced by the construction of the bridge in question. At that time the gentleman urged an objection on account of the lumber interest, and it transpired that of the lumber which starts at points up the river in Minnesota and Wisconsin and other portions of the Northwest, only 4 per cent. would ever pass under this bridge if it were erected, and I take it that the gentleman from Wisconsin will remember that Mr. Stout, of the Knapp, Stout & Co. company, who appeared before that committee, admitted, in response to a question of mine, that if they would move their lumber-yard up the river a short distance the lumber interest would not be affected at all.

At any rate, gentlemen who set up an objection like that in opposition to the vast interests which would be benefited by relieving the transcontinental commerce which centers at Saint Louis from the arbitrary tax levied on it by Jay Gould—a tax which he levies on the commerce of that whole Western country as the robbers of the Rhine once taxed the commerce of the free cities of the Rhine—gentlemen, I say, who oppose such a measure of relief on such grounds should hardly be considered. I regret very much the misfortune that has happened to the Knapp & Stout lumber company—no man can be pleased to have another suffer—but it is a matter of fact that since the hearing before the committee that lumber-yard has been burned, so that now the owners of it would not be required even to move it up the river a little distance in order to avoid inconvenience from the bridge. So much for the lumber traffic concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the great mass of commerce that crosses the river at that point and that now passes over the bridge which is owned by Jay Gould—and we all know that whatever Jay Gould owns he makes the most of—that great mass of commerce is in magnitude like the volume of the Mississippi itself, and the steamboats that would pass under this bridge are like a few stray geese floating down the stream from time to time, perhaps one or two or three a week.

The gentleman from Wisconsin knows that not a hundred thousand tons of merchandise of any kind go up that river annually by water. The question, then, is simply whether or not the people of that whole country west of the Mississippi shall be taxed arbitrarily at that point on everything they buy and sell. I have always noticed that the gentleman who owns that bridge and who confiscates the property of the people (for it is nothing less than confiscation) by what he calls his bridge "arbitrary"—I have always noticed that, like Proteus, he can disguise himself and appear in may different shapes; that he appears now in the shape of a steamboat transportation company, in which perhaps he owns an interest; that he appears again in the shape of a lumber-yard, and at other times in other shapes, but never with his own face or form or feature, and the truth is—no doubt without suspicion on the part of a great many gentlemen here, for I impugn nobody's motives—the truth is, that the objections to this bridge spring largely from the fact that Mr. Gould owns the existing bridge over which all this commerce has to pass, and that he hesitates to let go.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. GLOVER. In that one minute I desire to say that any gentleman who will read the majority report of the committee on the proposed bridge, and then the minority report, and then the answer of the Merchants' Exchange to the latter, will have all his doubts on the subject removed. I have said so much at this time, Mr. Speaker, simply because I did not want to see a proposition which is not now before the House prejudiced by the ingenious and eloquent blows aimed at it by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I now ask a vote on the two amendments, one to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "one hundred and three," the other to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty-three."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. I move a further amendment, to insert after the word "notice," in line 2 of section 4, the words "of the proposed construction of said bridge."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to propose an amendment to section 2, where it reads "said bridge shall have its axis at right angles to the current at all stages." That implies of course that the current is not the same at all stages. It can hardly be proposed that the axis of the bridge is to be changed to conform to the varying current. I move that the words "at all stages" be stricken out.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That amendment is open to debate, I believe, and I would like to make one or two remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this debate which has been indulged in by my friend from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Missouri; but as it touches the underlying principles of this bill I want to say one or two words. I will skip the "robbers of the Rhine" and the erudite tendencies of my friend from Missouri; but when it comes to his robbers of America I want to say a word. He intimates that the Mississippi River interests, the rafting interests, the towboat interests, and the ice interests, which are opposed to low bridges below the mouth of the Missouri, are here in disguise, representing Jay Gould. I want to resent that imputation. It is as small an insinuation as could possibly come from a small source and has no foundation in fact. It only belongs to the fancy that can go and revel with the "robbers of the Rhine."

In opposing low bridges, we are not here at the dictation of Jay Gould or any other money king. We are not opposing the construction of properly constructed bridges on the Mississippi or on the Ohio, and when not the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Louis but a little bevy of gentlemen who are struggling for a charter which means tens of thousands of dollars in their pockets desire to strangle the navigation of the Mississippi River, we do not wait for Jay Gould or for the gentleman from Saint Louis to tell us what our rights on this floor are. As for the gentleman fastening his little fangs in the smoking ruins of the lumber-yards of the Knapp, Stout & Co. company, if his great soul can enjoy that, let him enjoy it. True it is that $400,000 or more of their property have gone up in smoke; but like the plucky men that they have been, growing up with the West and helping to build up its business enterprises, they will plant their lumber there again, and they will carry their rafts, too, in spite of this little bevy of gentlemen from the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Louis.

Mr. CLARDY. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. With great pleasure.

Mr. CLARDY. If, because of the calamity which has overtaken these gentlemen, you propose to give them cheap rents, what will you do for the insurance companies that have had to pay their losses?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That question, Mr. Speaker, comes with bad grace from one of the broad-minded, kind-hearted men of this House; and I will let the man who asked it answer it. He ought to know that the insurance which is paid to these men is but a bagatelle as compared with their loss. If the gentleman intimates that the insurance brought on the fire, let him say so like a man and I will answer him like another. Until he does so I leave him to answer his own question.

Mr. CLARDY. I have not intimated anything of the kind.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I did not think you would.

Mr. CLARDY. The idea I meant to convey is this: If you propose to give these people cheap rents, what will you give the insurance companies, that have at least paid some of the losses? The object of that question was to show the absurdity of the argument.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. We are not asking for your rents; we get our grounds ourselves. We have our leased grounds; our rights are as sacred as those of any member of the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Louis.

Mr. CRISP. I regret, Mr. Speaker, a discussion should arise on the bridge at Cairo in reference to the Saint Louis bridge. That will come up directly, when we dispose of the pending bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will bear me out that I did not bring on that discussion. But for the insinuation made I would not have said a word.

Mr. CRISP. I wish to get through with this bill and get to others. I send up an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] moved to strike out the words "at all stages."

Mr. CRISP. I thought that amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It was pending at the time the discussion arose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. I now move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 4, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "in newspapers having a wide circulation."

In line 4, after the words "Saint Louis," insert the word "Cairo."

In line 5, after the words "New Orleans," insert the words "having a wide circulation."

Mr. CRISP. That amendment is merely for the purpose of correcting the language.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER BIGBEE RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. CRISP. I now call up the bill (H. R. 9725) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Bigbee River at or near Jackson, Ala., and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Unless the reading of the bill is demanded the Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the sixth section of the bill, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 6. That the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river is hereby expressly reserved, and all changes and alterations so required shall be made at the expense of the parties owning or controlling said bridge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS WEST PASCAGOULA RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. CRISP. I call up the bill (H. R. 6114) to require the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad Company to construct and maintain a suitable draw in said company's bridge across the West Pascagoula River, in the State of Mississippi.

The reading of the bill was not demanded.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce, and desire to state to the House the reason why I make that motion. This is for the construction of a bridge and draw across the west branch of the Pascagoula River, Mississippi; that is the western mouth of that river.

There is now across that branch a substantial iron bridge, without a draw, authorized by Congress and by act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi. Across the eastern branch or the eastern mouth there is a railroad bridge containing a draw. That branch has been improved by appropriation of money by Congress. Nearly all of the commerce of that river passes along the eastern branch. There are several towns and cities on that branch. There is no village on the western branch above the railroad bridge. There is nothing in the shape of commerce there except one saw-mill. There is at most only 3 feet of water in it, and just below the bridge it is almost impassable by an obstruction in the shape of an immense sand-bar. The commerce of the western branch amounts to little or nothing more than the lumber from this saw-mill.

There is then no necessity for putting the railroad company to the expense of erecting a bridge at this point in lieu of the one already there. The little commerce that floats along the western branch, or which would go along there if the bridge had a draw, is put to only a slight inconvenience by having to go a greater distance along the eastern branch of the river.

Again, it seems that it is not quite fair to this railroad company, inasmuch as an act of Congress authorized them to construct the bridge in the first instance which they are now using across that western branch; and it was also authorized by an act of the Legislature of Mississippi.

This bill seeks to compel them to destroy that bridge, to lose it entirely, and to put a new bridge there with a draw in it. I think the statements contained in the petitions which are being forwarded here by citizens in the county, and the only county which would be interested or benefited by a draw in the bridge across this western branch, are in opposition and show that there is no necessity for it.

I will state as a further reason for the motion that I derive my information from Gaylord B. Clarke, esq., a most reputable gentleman and an able lawyer of Mobile, who is the attorney for this railroad company. He desired to appear before the Committee on Commerce for the purpose of presenting the other side of the question. He wrote to a member of the House, who failed to get for him the information which would have enabled him to appear before the committee in time. He then wrote to me, and when I received the letter I applied to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and was informed by him that the bill had been already reported to the House. So that but one side has been heard, and the railroad company, through Mr. Clarke, representing them, desire an opportunity to appear before the committee and show the reason why the bill ought not to pass.

I think it is but a reasonable request, the gentleman having failed to get that opportunity through no fault of his own. It is a case where, in view of the facts, I trust the House will adopt the motion I submit, and recommit the bill to the committee merely for the purpose of allowing the railroad company to present its side. If it is not a good presentation, the committee can report the bill back and it can then pass the House.

Mr. CRISP. I merely wish to say, in behalf of the Committee on Commerce, that this bill, as is the case with all bills that the committee report for this purpose, was referred to the War Department for its approval. It is a bill requiring a certain railroad company to construct a draw in its bridge over a river. The Department recommended the passage of the bill in the interest of commerce, and we favorably reported it to the House. After it was so reported my friend from Alabama spoke to me as he has said, but it was then too late.

Speaking for myself and not for the committee, for I have no right to speak for them, I have no objection to its recommittal. If any injustice has been done or is likely to be done, I think the bill ought to be recommitted for further consideration.

Mr. OATES. I wish to say that no fault whatever attaches to the committee. It is one of those misunderstandings that is likely to happen to any person.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. OATES, it was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman if he is through with the bills to which there is no objection?

Mr. CRISP. I will state to the gentleman that the next bill I propose to call up is the bill for the erection of a bridge at Saint Louis.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. HALE presented two petitions of citizens of Maine, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES. I present a number of petitions from different Congressional districts of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of eight bills which have been set forth from time to time. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented thirteen petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, praying that Mrs. Julia D. Howe, of York, Nebr., be placed on the pension-roll for her service as nurse in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER presented ten petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

KNIGHTS OF LABOR PETITIONS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to present sundry petitions of the Knights of Labor and others in different parts of the State of Nebraska.

In that connection I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I make some suggestions with regard to this subject, because on several previous occasions some allusion has been made to these petitions and the manner of their being signed or presented. In order to show why I do this, I desire to read the following letter:

OFFICE KNIGHTS OF LABOR, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., July 20, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I notice on reading the RECORD of to-day, and I am further informed by reading the city papers, that Senators VEST, BROWN, LOGAN, BECK, and others have taken occasion by remarks upon the floor of the Senate to cast doubt and suspicion upon the numerous petitions recently laid before Congress emanating from the Knights of Labor and other citizens of the United States.

These petitions, I assure you, are all genuine, and were sent to me signed either directly or by authority of the persons purporting to sign them, and furthermore, the petitions are expressly authorized and sanctioned by the general executive board of the order in the United States.

I respectfully request that you correct the misrepresentations that have been made to the Senate and to the country. I also desire to call your attention to the remarks of Senator VEST in the Senate to-day, during which he read a portion of a correspondence between Mr. D. W. Bushyhead, of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and Mr. T. V. Powderly, grand master workman of the Knights of Labor. In the interest of truth and justice I ask you to have read the concluding letter of Mr. Powderly to Mr. Bushyhead, herewith inclosed, showing an attempt to deceive Mr. Powderly on the part of Mr. Bushyhead in regard to the character of the Oklahoma bill.

Respectfully, yours,

RALPH BEAUMONT, Chairman.

Hon. CHARLES H. VAN WYCK,
United States Senate.

The letter referred to from Mr. Powderly is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., July 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: When I wrote to you on the 12th I also wrote to Mr. Ralph Beaumont, at the same time placing in his hands your communication of the 7th. I requested of him to make an investigation and ascertain whether the statements made in your letter to me were correct so far as the petition which emanated from the congressional committee of the Knights of Labor was concerned. Mr. Beaumont has complied with my instructions and has made his report; he has also procured for me a copy of the bill in question, House bill No. 7217, known as the Oklahoma bill. A careful examination and comparison of the bill and your letter of the 7th has dispelled any doubts I might have had regarding the interference of this bill with the rights of the Cherokee Indians. I find that the very things which you claim are so essential to the welfare of the Cherokee Nation are embodied in the bill, and if it becomes a law it will not only protect the Indians themselves, but it will protect the lands in question from the cattle thieves who have intruded upon them.

You have either been misled into making the statements as contained in your letter of the 7th to me, or else it was your intention to mislead me into condemning one of the measures advocated by the congressional committee of the Knights of Labor. I can not find anything in the bill but what every honest man and friend to the Cherokee Nation can approve of most heartily.

I am told that you have exhibited to public gaze my letter of the 12th, in which I told you that I would cause an investigation to be made. It would have been as well to have awaited the result of that investigation before making known to the public the contents of my communication to you. I see in a special to the Philadelphia Times of this date that "those who were interested in the matter made some investigations at the instance of Mr. Powderly." I do not know the author of that statement, but take this opportunity of saying to you that I authorized no person to make an investigation except Mr. Beaumont, and at the time when the investigation mentioned in the Times of this date was being made Mr. Beaumont was in my presence in this city making his report. I am pleased to say that his report meets with my hearty approval, and I have counseled him to continue in the good work of protecting whites and Indians alike against those who would steal the land from both.

Very truly, yours,

T. V. POWDERLY, G. M. W.

D. W. BUSHYHEAD, Esq.,
Principal Chief, Cherokee Nation, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, it seemed necessary that this letter should be written——

Mr. LOGAN. Is there an allusion made to me in the letter?

Mr. VAN WYCK. In the letter which Mr. Beaumont wrote me he says:

I notice on reading the RECORD of to-day, and I am further informed by reading the city papers, that Senators VEST, BROWN, LOGAN, BECK, and others have taken occasion by remarks upon the floor of the Senate to cast doubt and suspicion upon the numerous petitions recently laid before Congress emanating from the Knights of Labor and other citizens of the United States.

Mr. Beaumont is chairman of what is known as the legislative committee of the Knights of Labor.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing to say about the bringing of letters of that character into the Senate to read about Senators, but I deny that I have said anything reflecting on the Knights of Labor or their petitions. I said the other day in presenting some petitions, quite a number of which I had in my hand, that I had looked at two or three of them, and that they seemed to be in the same handwriting. That is all the remark I made in connection with the matter. I cast no reflection upon the Knights of Labor or anybody else, except that I made that remark; and any one who will notice the petitions will find my statement verified from the fact that one of them was signed in pencil and in the same handwriting, and others were signed in ink in the same handwriting. All the remark I made was that some of them seemed to be in the same handwriting.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But Senators made those assertions and their statements appeared in the RECORD. It was deemed by them necessary that attention should be called to the matter, and therefore it was that Mr. Beaumont very properly wrote the letter and forwarded Mr. Powderly's letter.

The nature of the remarks of some Senators was such that at least the impression has gone abroad that there is some reflection cast upon the manner in which these petitions were circulated or signed. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], in alluding to the petition signed by Mr. Reall, the president of the National Dairymen's Association, alluded to it purporting to come from headquarters in the city of Washington, as if there should be something remarkable about that; and an allusion was also made to the fact that the headquarters of Mr. Beaumont, who is chairman of the legislative committee of the Knights of Labor, were at Washington. The inference would be drawn from the general tenor of the remarks that there was some doubt at least, if not suspicion, attached to the manner of the signing of these petitions, because one of the Senators alluded to the fact that the object of the petition was pasted upon the back of these petitions, whereas that was done for the convenience of Senators and Congressmen, so that when a petition is sent they shall not be compelled first to ascertain its contents and then make the necessary indorsement upon the back. It was for the purpose of preventing that labor that the indorsement was printed. It was printed upon paper and spread with mucilage so that it could be moistened and pasted upon the back of the petitions; and certainly there was nothing suspicious in that.

Some gentleman has stated, and it was stated yesterday, that the petitions appeared apparently in the handwriting of one or two persons. That is a matter capable of explanation. These petitions are in duplicate. One copy is intended to be sent to the Senate and the other to the House of Representatives, and when the petitions are drawn up the originals as these are—these are the originals [exhibiting]—instead of asking the persons signing them to stop in their pursuits to sign a second petition a copy is sometimes made of the petition, and the duplicate is obtained in that way.

Mr. SPOONER. Why could they not sign a duplicate petition?

Mr. VAN WYCK. That might be done, but all these gentlemen are not skilled, as you see by reading their letters; they are not clerks, they are not skilled in parliamentary tactics. I want to have it understood in that way, that the original is made and then it is copied by one or two persons, and the original is presented in one House and the copy in the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Nebraska that debate is not in order beyond a simple statement of the contents of a petition when it is presented.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I asked permission to make a statement. I supposed that leave was granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in accordance with the rule. The Chair will not interrupt the Senator but remind him of the rule.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understood three or four times that these petitions were attacked—I do not mean attacked offensively but I mean alluded to, and this is the only time they are defended; and I make this statement at the request of persons who think their good faith has been impugned in this matter. Three hundred thousand of these petitions have been presented in both bodies. If it is out of order now, I will seek an occasion at another time to state what the petitioners desire me to state. I shall have the right to be recognized on some subject before the Senate, and then talk upon that or any other subject as I may think best. But no one has been questioned in attacking these petitions; I mean in speaking of them before.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has a perfect right on the question of the reference of the petition to say anything he wishes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would rather not have a contest with the Chair on that subject.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Chair will not insist on the enforcement of the rule against the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say nothing further about it except to remind the Senator of the rule, which will be read. The rule authorizes a simple statement of the contents of a petition upon its presentation.

Mr. HOAR. This is on the question of reference.

Mr. INGALLS. It is on the question of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I suppose I shall continue, although I would prefer not to rest under the imputation of violating a rule of this body in doing so. But as these gentlemen prefer not to rest under the imputation of committing a fraud on the Congress of the United States in presenting these petitions, I shall proceed.

Here are petitions from the State of Nebraska, and when I open them, although the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] discovered none in his petitions from Missouri whose names he knew, I discover persons whom I am acquainted with, and I venture to say that my colleague is acquainted with some of the names of these petitioners, as they are from Omaha. The petitions are here in the original, and were signed in good faith, and, as I have said, as copies were to be presented to the other House, the copies would necessarily be in the handwriting of whoever should copy them.

That explains those two points, first, as to the handwriting, and in the next place as to the indorsement, which is a very intelligent statement of what the petitions contain.

In addition to that I will add that this is sometimes done in the assemblies of the Knights of Labor, and it is sometimes the case that in the meeting of an assembly, when a large number are gathered together, it is done by a resolution, and the members of the assembly ask that the secretary may sign their names to the petition. That is sometimes done. I know in some sections where a person can not sign his name to a petition, where the $80,000,000 bounty of our friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has not yet reached—where he can not sign his name, is he to be denied the right of petition because he asks his neighbor or friend or the presiding officer or the secretary to subscribe his name for him? It is true that these petitions which I present from Nebraska are in the proper handwriting of the petitioners, because fortunately we rank at the head on the score of education, and we have less of illiteracy in Nebraska than in any other State of the Union.

Mr. ALLISON. Except Iowa.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir, not even excepting Iowa. We are ahead of Iowa, whereas in Georgia, which my friend from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] represents, and possibly in Kentucky, a great proportion of the men who form the Knights of Labor, and who do drudgery upon the farms, may not be able to read and write and therefore can not sign their names to a petition, they necessarily have to ask a neighbor or friend to do it for them. I take it the Senator will not deny the right of petition to the white or colored laborers or the Knights of Labor in Georgia because they have been unable to learn even so much of the rudiments as to write their names.

I think I have touched upon all the three points which have been alleged and charged against the right of these petitioners, and it seems, and I think these people thought, and some of the people of the country thought, that it savored, not in kind, possibly not in degree, of that which happened at the time when John Quincy Adams presented in the other end of this building petitions from citizens of Massachusetts in regard to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. There it was boldly asserted that he had no right to present the petitions, and here seemingly—not intentionally, I grant—seemingly it is done by suspicion cast upon these petitions by one and another and another Senator rising in his place and arraigning and casting suspicion upon them, and questioning really by their act and some of them in their declaration whether the petitions are properly here.

Mr. President, three hundred thousand of these petitions have come to both branches of this Congress, and very nearly three hundred thousand more are on their way, and it would seem a little strange when this is open, notorious, when it is known in the States where these petitions are being gathered and sent here, that they should be questioned.

Senators are startled when they see the heading of the petition, "headquarters at Washington," and they say that Mr. Beaumont, the chairman of this committee, has his headquarters at Washington. It seemed to startle the Senator from Kentucky that the dairymen had a "headquarters at Washington." My friend from Kentucky asked, "is this man's farm at Washington?" No; but your tariff men gather at Washington, from which they frame and formulate petitions and scatter them to their friends and ask for signatures. Are they manufactured at Washington?

The great railroad presidents of the country will come to Washington. They do not carry a petition of three hundred thousand. All they need to do is to send an attorney, and he knocks at the door of your committee and it flies open and hats off, and in he walks. The Mississippi River improvement has headquarters at Washington. They do not send petitions here, but they bring a huge convention with headquarters in Washington. Does the Senator from Missouri rise in his place and say that the Mississippi River interest has come to Washington? This is the headquarters of the Mississippi River convention.

But when the farmer seeks to be heard and it seems necessary to have an agent at Washington for this purpose, or the Knights of Labor, then Senators become very sensitive about it, and they marvel and they wonder what it means, and they think there is to be an invasion upon the rights, the privileges, and the powers of the great Congress of the United States, because farmers who have no money to send attorneys, because the Knights of Labor who have no funds to send skillful, high-priced lawyers, must employ themselves and must content themselves by merely putting their manuscript before Congress. For doing that are they to be arraigned, and is suspicion to be cast upon their right, and is the sacred right of petition to be called in question?

No scandal will be connected with that, I am free to say; but why is there trouble about this matter? These men petition for what the nation desires. They publicly present their petition throughout this whole country. They ask all men who agree to it to sign, and they ask for what? Repealing the timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land acts, which apparently the whole nation is desirous to have done; for the adjustment of railroad and other land grants, which both bodies of Congress are seeking to do; bills forfeiting all railroad land grants the conditions of which have not been strictly complied with. That nominally we are all in favor of; theoretically we all say that. Both political parties say that in their platforms. It is true when we get here sometimes it is a very difficult thing to do; but at the same time they petition for it and they ask it of us.

Then the House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma. That seems to be the trouble. I judge so, because Mr. Bushyhead has interposed in the matter. Then for the Senate bill opening a portion of the great Sioux reservation to settlement, and the bill prohibiting aliens from holding land in the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. The Sioux bill has been passed twice by the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Sioux bill has been passed twice. I am stating that these petitioners publicly present their petitions and ask for what the nation demands and what Congress admits is a just demand. We passed the bill twice, but it is not done. The Sioux territory is not open to settlement, and the probability is it will not be, and that is just what ordinary people do not understand. They do not understand parliamentary tactics. The three hundred thousand citizens who signed these petitions and the three hundred thousand more on their way do not understand why, when both bodies of the American Congress are in favor of the passage of a proposition, it can not be done, and they seem to think that there is something strange about that. They ask for the passage of the bill prohibiting aliens from holding lands in the United States. That we are all in favor of, and that we have done, and the other House has done it.

The bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays and to punish bribery. That we all say is a right and proper measure to pass.

The bill directing the disbursement of at least two hundred million Treasury surplus. That is demanded. The other House passed such a bill nearly unanimously and the Senate will probably do the same thing. My friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] ought to know. He is on that committee. I say that they are asking that this disbursement of $200,000,000 shall be made; the House has passed it nearly unanimously, and I queried whether the Senate would not probably do the same thing after it gets to my friend's committee; and to substitute Treasury notes for bank notes retired. That is the only proposition on which there may be some difference or dispute. There may be some question about that.

This is what these people ask. Three hundred thousand citizens ask this, signing in their own proper persons, and yet when these petitions come here they are questioned by what seemed to be, though not intended, aspersions cast upon them, but questions as to good faith connected with them. They are asking for these important measures. I do not propose to discuss the matter of the Indian lands except to say that Mr. Bushyhead and other people can have their headquarters here, railroad men, and bank men, and tariff men, and even the Indian can come down here and have his headquarters at Washington. My friend from Missouri has read Bushyhead's letter. He has his headquarters here at Washington, and he did not object to that. He writes from headquarters in Washington. It is all right for this Indian to come here and have his headquarters, but when eight hundred thousand Knights of Labor have their headquarters in Washington, there seems to be censure cast upon them in alluding to it. When the great farming interest of this country has its president here and he signs his papers at headquarters, then my friend from Kentucky feels that it is alarming and that they should not have headquarters in Washington, but Bushyhead can have them all the same and it is all right.

Mr. President, I meant only to refer to this matter. Probably the Senator from Missouri did not know these people. They are exercising the American's privilege to petition the American Congress. They ask what nine-tenths of the American people demand, and they can present their petition in only two forms, first, as they have presented it, and the only other petition they can make will be at the ballot-box, and if it becomes necessary they will exercise the other, the most powerful petition which they can present. That undoubtedly they will do, and at that time gentlemen will begin to know who they are, and where they belong, and where they come from, and what their rights are.

In regard to this Oklahoma matter, the men have been characterized very properly. I shall not use those terms for it is not necessary, but they have been denounced as men who have invaded that country, and the Cherokee strip of 6,000,000 acres can be rendered to six men, and Oklahoma can be used by cattle-men who intending to drive cattle start them farther west than where they are, and the chances are they do not go far enough west to get out of the Indian Territory. Yet Americans on the eastern border are kept off, white men who go with the principles of the Christian religion and who seek to disseminate education. The object seems to be to keep them out, and I take it that is the most troublesome point about it.

The desire and the want is that we should keep what there is now left of public land for settlement, or even of Indian land which probably should not belong to the Indians or which we should probably obtain from them. Is the Sioux reservation kept for hunting-grounds? Oh, no, there is no talk about that. There is no deer, no game, in Dakota on the immense Sioux reservation. My friend from Iowa says the bill to open that reservation has passed both Houses, and yet the exclamation comes again, Why are not those lands opened to settlement?

I ask the pardon of the Senate for having said so much, but I felt it to be my duty in order to show the good faith of these petitioners, first, in what they ask, and, secondly, in the manner in which the petitions are prepared and have been presented to this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the third and fourth clauses of the seventh rule of the Senate in regard to petitions. The Chair simply presents the rule for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

3. Every petition or memorial shall be referred, without putting the question, unless objection to such reference is made; in which case all motions for the reception or reference of such petition, memorial, or other paper shall be put in the order in which the same shall be made, and shall not be open to amendment, except to add instructions.

4. Before any petition or memorial shall be received, it shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist, and a brief statement of its contents made by the presiding officer or Senator presenting it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That was a question I omitted. I was afraid I was omitting something. I should have ascertained, if possible, to what committee these petitions properly belong, so as to know what order should be made in regard to them. That was the real point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Chair had the rule read, not to reproach the Senator from Nebraska, but simply to show by the rule that if the morning hour is to be interrupted by discussion on the merits of a bill of course it would be impossible to get through with the ordinary business.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the petitions be referred to the proper committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make one remark only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a remark. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope that the Senator from Nebraska will hear me. After this remarkable tirade—I can characterize it by no other name—a part of it reflecting upon myself, I desire to say in response that I have never refused to present a petition for any citizen of the United States on any subject. I have presented hundreds of petitions of the character mentioned by the Senator. The other morning in presenting some of these petitions, which he now explains and shows I was correct, I made the remark that the signatures to some of the petitions seemed to be in the same handwriting. That is all I said. Now the Senator says they were in the same handwriting because some of them were copies. What criticism does the Senator think ought to apply to me if I made a statement that is absolutely correct? I made no reflection upon these men; I merely made that remark; and here is a half hour's speech now. You would think the country was on fire, or some revolution had taken place, or some great calamity had befallen some community or other. The Senator seems to take advantage of things of this kind for the purpose of boosting himself by characterizing other Senators here in a manner which is not very seemly in a body like this.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I made no sort of allusion or in any way referred to the Senator from Illinois or any other Senator. I stated what had been alleged in regard to these petitions, and the impression in the public mind, and the impression in the mind of the persons who sent them here.

I made the remarks which I did at the request of the gentleman whose letter I read, and the Senator from Illinois or any other Senator must make his quarrel with him and not with me. He stated what had been alleged against these petitions and desired me to make the explanation, which I have done without intending to reflect upon the Senator from Illinois or any other Senator in this body.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have no misunderstanding whatever with my constituents on the subject-matter presented here by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not in order to present morning business?

Mr. BROWN. I rose to a question of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia rose to what is in the nature of a personal explanation.

Mr. BROWN. A personal explanation. It will not be lengthy.

Since I have been in the Senate I have never refused in any instance to present a petition of even the humblest citizen of my State when he has sent it to me in any shape, even in the shape of a letter, if he informed me that he desired it laid before the Senate as a petition or to bring his grievance before the Senate.

I have received repeatedly petitions from the Knights of Labor in my own State, sent to me directly by them, and have in every instance, when requested, presented them to the Senate. They know very well that I will do so whenever I am requested. I do not deny their right, however, to send the petitions to some intermediary in Washington city, or some officer of their order, to be forwarded to me by him, instead of having them come directly to me through the mail, and in every instance where they have reached me in that shape I have presented them to the Senate.

The other morning, however, on looking over the petitions and seeing that they all seemed to be in the same handwriting and not knowing the reason why they were sent through some other person instead of coming to me directly by mail, I simply stated the fact to the Senate and called attention to the fact that the signatures appeared to be in the same handwriting. Nobody questions that. And the Senator from Nebraska now admits that they are all in the same handwriting. This was all I did. I did nobody any injustice.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion to him right there?

Mr. BROWN. I would rather close.

Mr. HOAR. It is in aid of the Senator's position, and I think he would like to have me make it. The rule requires that—

Before any petition or memorial shall be received, it shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist, and a brief statement of its contents made by the presiding officer or Senator presenting it.

Now, therefore, under the rule of the Senate if a petition be not signed by a single petitioner it is the duty of the Senator presenting it to call the attention of the Senate at the time, so that there may be unanimous consent implied to the waiving of the rule in that particular.

The Senator from Georgia therefore did what he was imperatively bound to do by the rule, called the attention of the Senate, so that for presentation there should be the unanimous assent of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for the suggestion, and the rule as he reads it fortifies me, as he well states, in the course I took.

I meant no disrespect certainly for anybody. I feel that I have done nothing wrong, and I have nothing whatever to apologize for.

As far as creating any prejudice against me with my constituents is concerned, I leave any Senator who thinks proper to take his own course in that regard. The people of Georgia understand very well that I am not the enemy of the laboring man. I have on various occasions in my life as a candidate gone before the people of my State, and where the popular vote was cast at the ballot-box I have always been sustained. I was known to be the friend of the laborer, or I should not have met with this response at the ballot-box. I never was defeated as a candidate in a popular election by the people, and I am not afraid of anything that is said or done here creating a prejudice in their minds against me, or shaking their confidence in my fidelity to them. I know I am their friend, and they know I am their friend.

I will lay their petitions before the Senate whenever they come to me in any shape that I consider authentic; but if they come in any shape that is not in accordance with the rule, or where there is any peculiarity about them, I shall feel justified, as in the past, in calling the attention of the Senate to the true condition of things.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presentation of petitions and memorials is still in order. If there be no further petitions to be presented reports from committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 512) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the appointment of civil officers, to report the same without amendment, and I am directed by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], to communicate to the Senate his dissent from the report.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely wish to state that I dissent from the report of the committee, and when the matter comes before the Senate will give my reasons.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 509) to repeal certain provisions of the act approved March 3, 1875, relating to the purchase of arms for the use of the States, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4670) granting to the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, the right to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in said county and State.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 63) to authorize the construction of a highway bridge across that part of the waters of Lake Champlain lying between the towns of North Hero and Alburg, in the State of Vermont;

A bill (S. 236) to authorize the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges in the Territory of Washington;

A bill (S. 1937) authorizing the city of Salem to construct a bridge across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon; and

A bill (S. 2115) granting to the Oregonian Railway Bridge Company of Oregon the right to construct a bridge over the Willamette River in the vicinity of Ray's Landing, Oregon.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 901) to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The mesage also announced that the House had passed a resolution directing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at 3 o'clock p. m. July 28, 1886; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5179) entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States," after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert at the end of section 3 "except that in addition to any indebtedness created for such purposes the Legislature may authorize a loan for the erection of penal, charitable, or educational institutions for such Territory if the total indebtedness of the Territory is not thereby made to exceed 1 per cent. upon the assessed value of the taxable property in such Territory as shown by the last general assessment for taxation, and nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the refunding of any existing indebtedness of such Territory or of any political or municipal corporation, county, or other subdivision therein;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "two," in section 4, and insert "four;" and at the end of section 4 insert the following: "That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to affect the validity of any act of any Territorial Legislature heretofore enacted or of any obligations existing or contracted thereunder, nor to preclude the issuing of bonds already contracted for in pursuance of express provisions of law, nor to prevent any Territorial Legislature from legalizing the acts of any county municipal corporation, or subdivision of any Territory as to any bonds heretofore issued or contracted to be issued;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "law," where the same occurs the second time in section 6, the words "of Congress;" and the Senate agree to the same.

BEN. HARRISON,
M. C. BUTLER,
CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
WILLIAM D. HILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2869) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tradewater River by the Ohio Valley Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2870) for the relief of A. B. Mullett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business the Calendar is in order.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Payne case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Hon. HENRY B. PAYNE.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask unanimous consent to take up a bill which very materially affects some sureties in my State in a matter of indebtedness to the Government arising some twenty years ago, and the Department with whose officers I have conversed recommend that Congress grant relief in the case. The report of the committee is very positive and the Senate has acted in that way. In order that the bill may get to the House and save a continuance of the prosecution between now and next session I ask the Senate to pass the bill.

I do not like to interfere with the Senator from Alabama, but we have no morning hour now, and this is a matter of very vital importance to the heirs and widows of various citizens there.

Mr. PUGH. I am very much disposed to accommodate gentlemen; but I moved the consideration of this order of business, and it is now before the Senate. There seems to be a general desire that it shall be finished to-day, and in order to do so we must have an early beginning.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator will allow me to ask unanimous consent that we may have to-morrow morning the usual calendar hour until half past 12, I think we can dispose of it and probably of a large number of bills to which there is no objection. I ask that unanimous consent be given now that to-morrow after the routine morning business we have until half past 12 o'clock for unobjected cases on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. PUGH. I feel constrained to object.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not object to taking for the Calendar whatever time there may be after the routine business to-morrow morning until half past 12 o'clock. There is not a Senator here who has not some matter on the Calendar to which there can be no objection. It is for to-morrow morning, not this morning.

Mr. CONGER. I asked for to-morrow morning.

Mr. PUGH. If it is for to-morrow, I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the order suggested by the Senator from Michigan will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

OHIO SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. PUGH. The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is before the Senate, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the single question presented to the Senate by the three reports on the election of HENRY B. PAYNE as Senator from the State of Ohio is, whether the Senate, on the whole case, as reported, shall order an investigation of the charge that his election was procured by bribery. There is no charge or pretense that HENRY B. PAYNE had any participation or connection, by act or knowledge, with any bribery or wrongdoing, if any were committed, to secure his election. There is nothing, therefore, upon which to base a motion or resolution for his expulsion.

I call the special attention of the Senate to the language of the minority report, in which Senator HOAR, the chairman of the committee, and Senator FRYE, formulate the only question, in their opinion, to be decided by the Senate. On page 35 of the report of the minority is found these words: "We are not now to consider whether the case is proved, or even whether there be a prima facie case." "There has as yet been no evidence laid before us addressed to either of these considerations."

Mark the admission of the minority, that as yet there has been no evidence addressed to the inquiry whether the charge of bribery is true, or addressed to the inquiry whether a prima facie case for reasonable belief that the charge is true has any existence. What, then, do the minority claim to be the question before the Senate? They answer for themselves—"Is there fair reason for instituting an inquiry whether the result of the election was procured by bribery?" What the difference is between evidence that makes out a prima facie case and evidence that "there is fair reason for instituting an inquiry whether the election was procured by bribery" the minority must explain.

In the report signed by three majority members of the committee the following language is found on page 12:

> The integrity of the election and not of the member is in question. * * * The investigation, which now deals with the election as vitiated and not the member as innocent, must reach the proof that the fraud, corruption, or bribery embraces enough in number of the voting electors to have changed, by these methods, the result of the election.

In the report signed by the four majority members the following language is used:

> The Senate must be satisfied by legal evidence that a sufficient number of the members of the Legislature were bribed by the friends of the sitting member to secure the votes of enough members of the Legislature to insure his election, and that without the votes thus corruptly obtained the sitting member would not have been declared elected.

Or that the evidence must make out the charge or create a reasonable belief that the charge could be established, and the sitting member deprived of his seat by an investigation.

One of the most extraordinary statements to be found among the many in the report of the minority is the following:

> As the Senate is the only court that can properly try this question, so the charge is made, if not in the only way it can be made yet certainly in the way beyond all others in which it can be made with most authority. * * * For the Senate to refuse to listen to this complaint so made would, it seems to us, be, and be everywhere taken to be, a declaration that it is indifferent to the question whether its seats are to be in the future the subject of bargain and sale, or may be presented by a few millionaires as a compliment to a friend.
> * * * * * * *
> But—
> Say the minority—
> the case does not rest alone upon the charge and the character of the parties who make it, and who ask to be permitted to produce evidence in its support. If it did, it, in our judgment, would be enough.

Enough simply to make the charge. Such a startling proposition was never before announced in the Senate, and never received a moment's consideration.

In the case of Lapham and Miller, reported in Senate Election Cases by Taft, page 643, the committee say through their chairman that—

> The last ground alleges—
> In a memorial by members of the New York Legislature—> that there were rumors of bribery in procuring the election of these gentlemen. The allegation of mere rumors of bribery is not sufficient, unaccompanied with evidence, to require investigation at the hands of the Senate or of its committees.

In the case of Senator Simon Cameron, found in the same report, page 185, the Committee on the Judiciary say in their report that—

> The third ground of protest is signed by members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, but not by the members of the senate of that State.
> It is a general allegation "that the election of the said Simon Cameron was procured, as they are informed and believe, by corrupt and unlawful means, influencing the action and votes of certain members of the house of representatives," and the Senate of the United States is asked to investigate the charge.
> The committee can not recommend that this prayer be granted. The allegation is entirely too vague and indefinite to justify such a recommendation. Not a single fact or circumstance is detailed as a basis for the general charge. Neither the nature of the means alleged to be corrupt and unlawful, nor the time, place, or manner of using them, is set forth, nor is it even alleged that the sitting member participated in the use of such corrupt means or, indeed, had any knowledge of their existence. Under no state of facts could your committee deem it consistent with propriety, or with the dignity of this body, to send out a roving commission in search of proofs of fraud in order to deprive one of its members of a seat to which he is, prima facie, entitled; still less can they recommend such a course when the parties alleging the fraud and corruption are themselves armed with ample powers for investigation. If it be, indeed, true that members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania have been influenced by corrupt considerations or unlawful appliances, the means of investigation and redress are in the power of the very parties who seek the aid of the Senate of the United States. Let their complaint be made to the house of which they are members, and which is the tribunal peculiarly appropriate for conducting the desired investigation. That their complaint will meet the respectful consideration of that house your committee are not permitted to doubt. If upon such investigation the facts charged are proven, and if they in any manner involve the character of the recently elected member of this body from the State of Pennsylvania, the Constitution of the United States has not left the Senate without ample means for protecting itself against the presence of unworthy members in its midst.
> In the mean time your committee see no reason for initiating any proceeding on the subject, and submit the following resolution:
> Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

How does the opinion of the Judiciary Committee then, on this identical question, agree with the opinion of the minority now expressed as follows in their report:

> The Senate is the only court which has, or under the Constitution possibly can have, jurisdiction of this question. There can be no trial, inquiry, or adjudication anywhere else to which this inquiry is not totally foreign and immaterial.

But I desire to call the attention of the minority, and especially of the Senate, to the undisputed action of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as reported by the four members on page 7.

> When your committee met to consider the matter referred to them, the first act of the committee was to comply fully with the first request of the Ohio house, and that was to make an examination of all the testimony taken by the select committee of the Ohio house of representatives under its resolution No. 28, the report of that select committee being all that was then before your committee. After several days' examination of the testimony the chairman of your committee, at our next meeting, made his report as copied in the minority report, which is, in effect, after careful reading of the testimony contained in Mis. Doc. No. 106, no evidence, opinion, or statement whatever was found personally inculpating HENRY B. PAYNE in any way in any bribery or the corrupt use of money in his election to the Senate. Neither did such examination show that enough had been found in the testimony to justify the charge that the election of Mr. PAYNE was procured by the corrupt use of money, or that there was anything in the testimony taken under the Ohio house resolution No. 28 to justify your committee in reporting in favor of a further investigation by the Senate. On the contrary, it was agreed that the testimony was insufficient to support the charge and insufficient to justify the committee in reporting to the Senate that the title of Senator PAYNE to his seat ought to be investigated.

The chairman has had the report he made to his committee in writing read to the Senate. I have stated its substance and effect, and if I have done so incorrectly my inaccuracy can be corrected by reading the report itself, which is in possession of the Senate.

It is an indisputable fact that on the case made by the Ohio house of representatives, after over three months' examination of fifty-five witnesses, the Committee on Privileges and Elections heard no suggestion from any member that there was enough testimony found to report to the Senate in favor of an investigation. The select committee of the Ohio house, after hearing the witnesses, made no charge and admitted their inability to frame one on the proof.

The Ohio house of representatives could then frame no charge, but they followed the advice of the select committee and sent an authenticated copy of the testimony to the Senate for examination and such action as the Senate thought proper. After the Committee on Privileges and Elections finished the examination and made its decision on the testimony referred to them, somehow or other the Ohio house and the Republican state committee heard that the Committee on Privileges and Elections had concluded that no specific charge had been made by the Ohio house or its special committee on the testimony, and that the Senate committee had come to the conclusion that no charge was made and none supported by the evidence.

So the Ohio house determined as an afterthought to renew the effort to get an examination by the Senate, and did so by making the specific charge that the election of HENRY B. PAYNE was procured by the corrupt use of money or by bribery. But having no hope that the Senate would order an examination on the naked, unsupported charge, the Ohio house based the charge solely and expressly on the testimony taken by their select committee, and which had been forwarded to the Senate. The formulation of the charge of bribery by the Ohio house has caused to be presented to the Senate of the United States the singular spectacle of one report by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to his committee that the testimony taken by the Ohio house was insufficient to justify the Senate in making another examination; but as soon as the Ohio house differed with him and declared that the testimony was "ample" to sustain the charge of bribery, we have another report by the chairman to the Senate that the testimony is not only sufficient to satisfy "fair reason," but that the mere unsupported charge by the Ohio house and senate should be treated as conclusive on the question whether another investigation should be made by the Senate of the United States.

Another remarkable feature of the minority report is that after declaring the Senate to be a court possessing the only judicial power to ascertain the truth of the charge and pass upon the title of Senator PAYNE to his seat, and themselves being two of the judges of this court, they dump upon the Senate for its consideration and digestion all the trash and filth that could be scraped up from Democratic newspapers and anonymous letter-writers in relation to the means employed to secure the election of HENRY B. PAYNE to the United States Senate. Can it be possible that such stuff had any weight in the minds of the minority in coming to a judicial determination of the momentous question referred to them, or did they expect that such wholly irrelevant matter that was never heard of by the committee, and if it had been was well known never to have been permitted to receive any consideration, would have a feather's weight in the Senate or be allowed to stain the records of the Senate? Why was this newspaper gossip and speculation rehashed and spread before the Senate and the country? How did the select committee of the Senate treat such testimony in the case of Powell Clayton, reported by Taft, on page 389?

If it should be asked, why not now submit all the testimony? we answer: First, because we know that much of it can have no possible bearing upon the question before us and the Senate, and its publication would involve a large and most unnecessary expense. Second, no useful end is to be gained by giving to the country a mass of testimony which only serves to show the bitterness of personal feeling existing between those prosecuting and their friends on one side, and the party accused and his friends on the other, which had its birth in the zeal of opposing political factions, to blacken and disparage the party integrity of those opposing them; which would only tend to still further disturb and distract the citizens of the State where they reside and render more difficult the restoration of that peace and quiet so essential in all the States, and especially those so lately in insurrection. And this course is the more justified from a conviction, which we can not now escape, that not a little of it was offered by the parties more with the view of making political capital against each other than in the hope or belief that it could have any influence upon the committee, or throw light upon the subject-matter under investigation. We do not propose to be the instrument of a purpose so foreign, and we most respectfully submit that the Senate should not and will not lend itself to the publication in advance of a mass of testimony which in no manner tends to elucidate the real question before them, and which, if published, while it might gratify the malevolence of parties, could not possibly serve any useful end. It would be worse than waste paper.

Mr. President, I simply desired to present to the Senate the question involved in these reports. In the name of seven out of nine members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it is unlikely that any graver topic will ever arise, even here, than that presented by the three reports from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We shall not be held by the American people to exaggerate the importance to them of the question whether they have somewhere under their Constitution a defense against the usurpation of seats in the Senate through bribery in a State Legislature. A great State, larger than many kingdoms, third in power and population among American Commonwealths, demands at our hands the vindication of her honor, and the assertion of her title to sit here among her peers in a free and unbought representation. What can concern the Senate more than the measure and the rule of its authority to judge of the election of its own members?

The office of Senator, to which the foremost of your countrymen have aspired as the highest object of their ambition, will be cheap and base if the credential under which you sit does not imply beyond all question or cavil that you are the true representatives of your States by lawful and unsullied election. It is due to the sitting member himself to have that inquiry which alone can make it appear that the suspicion which we are all so eager to testify does not rest upon him personally ought not hereafter to rest upon the friends who are nearest to him, or the State which has so honored him, or upon his title to his great office.

I am not apt to pay much attention to mere clamors coming from the malice, or the disappointments, or the excitements, or the ambitions of politics.

> The air hath bubbles, as the water hath,
> And these are of them.

But it is one thing to disregard idle-clamor, and another to encounter the disapproval of the aroused moral sense of the country. We must not confound slander with public opinion, or accept the accusations of scandal and malice instead of proof. But we shall make a worse mistake, if, because of the multitude of false and groundless charges against men in high office, we fail to redress substantial grievances or to deal with cases of actual guilt. The worst evil resulting from the indiscriminate attack of an unscrupulous press upon men in public station is not that innocence suffers, but that crime escapes. Pure and stainless lives are the sufficient shield against scandal and malice. Let corruption and bribery be exposed and punished. The conscience and judgment of the country govern, and have a right to govern, the country. The Senate in all its actions, especially in exercising its discretion, must respect them or cease to be respected itself.

The question now before the Senate is not how a case shall be decided, but only whether an inquiry shall be instituted. One thing, I suppose, will be conceded by everybody. The power, wherever it be, which should make this inquiry must be one which can compel the attendance of unwilling witnesses. It must be a power having jurisdiction to hear and decide the case after the inquiry is made. It must be a power which can issue process and compel obedience to process coextensive with its jurisdiction. It must be able to search this whole nation, interested to know who shall be its rulers, for the evidence which is to establish their title. From the nature of the case, as I have said, such an inquiry must search the knowledge of unwilling witnesses. The men who know the truth of the ultimate fact will not disclose it if they can help it. Especially they will take no part in that voluntary disclosure which alone could establish the case in advance of the Senate's decision. Men who bribe and men who are bribed, men who are accomplices or spectators of bribery, men who are the companions of those who commit this offense or are familiar with their affairs, will not ordinarily volunteer to aid in the detection.

The process which must bring into judgment the title to a seat in the Senate impeached for this cause must not wait for the establishment of the case in advance, or it will never issue. All that should be required, as it seems to me, is a charge from a responsible complainant—from a person or public body of sufficient weight to assure the Senate that it will not be made lightly or without reason. It is not necessary to define exactly by a rule which will cover all cases what should be the qualifications of such complainant. But certainly the Legislature of the State chiefly concerned is such a complainant. Certainly the governor of the State is such a complainant. Certainly the members of the House of Representatives of the United States are entitled to make such complaint. Certainly the majority of the conductors of the press of both political parties, or even of one great political party of a State of four millions of people, constitute such complainants. But when, as here, these are combined, it is impossible that there can ever be a suitor who may rightfully bring this cause into judgment if these may not. But there is a great deal more in the case than the character of the complainants. I shall show presently that they state grounds and reasons for the inquiry which I think any court or magistrate under the sun would hold as matter of law to constitute probable cause. I wish first, however, to speak briefly of the proceedings of the committee of the Ohio house on which so much stress has been laid by the Senators who are in the majority. The majority of the committee base the argument by which they support their position wholly upon those proceedings. The following extract from the report of the Republican members of the majority states their opinion very clearly:

At the outset of our observations we stated the limits which properly should control the action of the Senate, under the applicable clauses of the Constitution, and by the same reason the ends which should be proposed in its investigations and to which they should be confined. It is obvious that the province and duty of a State, in its investigations of fraud, corruption, and bribery in an election of Senator, are much more extensive. A State is not confined at all to the question whether the actual election brought in question involves the Senator personally in misconduct, or whether enough votes for him were affected by fraud, corruption, or bribery that would require his seat to be vacated, although himself free from imputation.

With that proposition, as I understand it, I wish to join direct issue. I deny it altogether. I deny what it expressly affirms, and I deny what it implies. I deny that "the province and duty of a State in its investigations of fraud, corruption, and bribery in an election of Senator are much more extensive" than those of the Senate. On the contrary, I affirm that its province and duty are to be confined to the punishment of individual guilt, and that with the question what was its effect on the election, or even whether the election was accomplished by it, it has nothing to do. So far from agreeing that "a State is not confined at all to the question whether the actual election brought in question involves the Senator personally in misconduct, or whether enough votes for him were affected by fraud, corruption, or bribery that would require his seat to be vacated, although himself free from imputation," I say that the State can never by any possibility have anything to do with those questions. So far from "not being confined" to those limits, it never can enter those limits at all. I deny also the limit of the power and duty of the Senate which is stated by the majority of the committee. It is this misconception, as it seems to me, that has misled my associates, if they have been misled. The only reason I hear urged anywhere for denying the prayer of the State of Ohio is the supposed effect to be given to the proceeding before the committee of her house of representatives. Let us look into this matter a little more carefully. Besides the provision I have already cited which makes the Senate the judge of the election and returns of its own members, the Constitution provides in its first article, section 4:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

In the matter of the election of Senators Congress has taken into its own hands and exercised its power to make these regulations.

The Revised Statutes of the United States, sections 14 to 19, cover the whole subject, which I will ask the Secretary to read, in order that the very familiar process may become still more familiar to the Senate for the purposes of this debate.

The Secretary read as follows:

TITLE II.

THE CONGRESS.

CHAPTER 1.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

SEC. 14. The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

SEC. 15. Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for, who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock m., of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house, he shall be declared duly elected Senator. But if the same person has not received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to take proceedings as required by this section, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for Senator, and the person who receives a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. If no person receives such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock m., of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and shall take at least one vote, until a Senator is elected.

SEC. 16. Whenever on the meeting of the Legislature of any State a vacancy exists in the representation of such State in the senate, the Legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to elect a person to fill such vacancy, in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term.

SEC. 17. Whenever during the session of the Legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the Legislature is organized and has notice of such vacancy.

SEC. 18. It shall be the duty of the executive of the State from which any Senator has been chosen, to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States.

SEC. 19. The certificate mentioned in the preceding section shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

Mr. HOAR. These provisions, Mr. President, were intended, among other objects, to prevent either house of the Legislature of the State whose majority might be in the minority on joint ballot to defeat or prevent an election. After the vote has been cast, the majority of the two houses concurring, or on joint ballot, everything else is ministerial. The clerk records the viva voce vote of the members on the journal of the two houses. The journals of the two houses are compared, the concurrent choice is announced, or the vote goes on in joint assembly until a result is reached; the executive certifies the election; the secretary of state countersigns the certificate; the credential comes to the President of the Senate. The State can not insert anywhere the sharpest razor's edge of jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of the election. When the credential is presented here under the almost unbroken practice of both houses, the Senator takes his seat upon the prima facie case made by the credential, subject to the inquiry which the Senate alone can make into his title upon the merits.

It is true that if the seat be declared vacant the Legislature must make a new election. But that can not happen until the Senate has declared the vacancy.

It was, then, never possible under the Constitution that the Ohio Legislature, or either house thereof, could inquire into Mr. PAYNE'S title to his seat as affected by his own misconduct or by that of any other person. It would hardly be expected that such an inquiry, if it were possible, would be undertaken during the life of the Legislature alleged to be corrupted. One branch of a subsequent Legislature undertook the inquiry, limited by the express terms of its order to charges against four of its members.

Whereas the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette of January 12, 1886, contains a printed statement, on the authority of S. W. Donavin, alleging grave charges against the official integrity and characters of members of this house, namely, Hon. D. Baker, Hon. P. Hunt, Hon. W. A. Schultz, and Hon. Mr. Ziegler, so definite and precise in statement as to call for immediate action in order to vindicate the reputation of members of this house: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into all the facts of the charges so alleged.

Mr. President, even the constitutionality of that inquiry has been doubted in very high quarters. It has been claimed by a very large number of persons in this or the other House of Congress that no House could inquire into the turpitude for purposes of expulsion or discipline of a person for acts which occurred before his taking his seat in the body. But I do not share that doubt myself. I merely make that observation in passing.

Now, it is well settled that no legislative body can compel obedience to process in support of an inquiry which does not affirmatively appear to be within its jurisdiction. That matter has been very recently before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kilbourn vs. Thompson, where the court held—I will only read a very few sentences from the opinion of the court, which is quite long:

Such an enlargement of jurisdiction—

Which was claimed by the House of Representatives in that case—

Would not now be tolerated in England, and it is hoped not in this country of written constitutions and laws; but it looks very like it when, upon the allegation that the United States is a creditor of a man who has an interest in some other man's business, the affairs of the latter can be subjected to the unlimited scrutiny or investigation of a Congressional committee.

We are of opinion, for these reasons, that the resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing the investigation was in excess of the power conferred on that body by the Constitution; that the committee therefore had no lawful authority to require Kilbourn to testify as a witness beyond what he voluntarily chose to tell; that the orders and resolutions of the House and the warrant of the Speaker, under which Kilbourn was imprisoned, are in like manner void for want of jurisdiction in that body, and that his imprisonment was without any lawful authority.

There is a case upon the same general subject decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts, from which I will extract also a single passage, the opinion given by Judge Hoar.

Mr. PLATT. What is the case?

Mr. HOAR. The case of Burnham vs. Morrissey, 14 Gray. The extract is from page 238. This passage is cited in Kilbourn vs. Thompson, with strong expressions of commendation, by the Supreme Court of the United States:

The house of representatives is not the final judge of its own powers and privileges in cases in which the rights and liberties of the subject are concerned, but the legality of its action may be examined and determined by this court. That house is not the Legislature but only a part of it, and is, therefore, subject in its action to the laws, in common with all other bodies, officers, and tribunals within the Commonwealth. Especially is it competent and proper for this court to consider whether its proceedings are in conformity with the constitution and laws, because, living under a written constitution, no branch or department of the government is supreme; and it is the province and duty of the judicial department to determine in cases regularly brought before them whether the powers of any branch of the government, and even those of the Legislature in the enactment of laws, have been exercised in conformity with the constitution; and if they have not been, to treat their acts as null and void.

So that an order to inquire into facts made by a State Legislature, and especially made by one branch of a State Legislature, as in this national legislative body, unless it is as to a matter within the jurisdiction of that body, confers upon the House or the committee who are its organ no power to put questions to witnesses, to compel the attendance of witnesses, or to compel the answers of witnesses.

Not only could no process issue from this Ohio house of representatives beyond State lines, but no process to compel the attendance of witnesses to testify to anything which may be in issue here in this trial. Every such process would be totally void, whether within or without the State. The witness could neither be compelled to appear nor compelled to answer. The marshal who undertakes an arrest or commitment for contempt would be a trespasser and liable for false imprisonment.

The Ohio house of representatives neither had nor conceived they had, any power to inquire into Mr. PAYNE'S title to his seat. The resolution is limited to charges against four persons, members of that body, in order, as it declares, "to vindicate the reputation of members of this House." The committee completed its work and vindicated the four members. They say that they went beyond the scope of the resolution only "to gain something like a comprehensive view of the situation." But they also say that they report no conclusion whatever except as to the four members. They say:

A number of clews furnished were not followed, because we were convinced that they could lead only to points at which further pursuit would become necessary, but which could not be pressed without authority to reach beyond the limits of the State for witnesses, and much anonymous information was ignored by the committee for the same reason.

When witnesses refused to answer, as they did in several cases, they did not press them.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me the most amazing legal and constitutional proposition ever uttered in this Chamber, is that this great court should be ousted of its jurisdiction, or affected in the smallest degree in its exercise by the failure of a committee to exhaust evidence in regard to an issue which they had no jurisdiction whatever to try, to wit, the inquiry as to the sitting member's title to his seat, a committee who were never directed to do it, who did not do it, who did not try to do it, who did not conceive they had a right to do it, and who had, in fact, no power, constitutional, legal, or physical, to enable them to do it.

There has been, I believe, but one case in our history where such an inquiry has been refused. In every other case, so far as I remember, which has been presented to the Senate the inquiry has been had either at the request of the sitting member or by order of the Senate.

In the Pennsylvania case in 1857 a minority of one house only of the Legislature of that State made a protest against the election of the Senator, in which they charged that the election was "procured by corrupt and unlawful means." Members of the Senate joined in that protest upon other grounds, but not upon this. The Judiciary Committee in denying the prayer of these members in the Pennsylvania case for an investigation treated the charge all through as not affecting the Senator's title to his seat, but only as against the personal misconduct of members of that Legislature as a ground of expulsion.

Now I wish to call attention to a few words from the report of the Judiciary Committee in the Pennsylvania case in 1857:

The committee can not recommend that this prayer—

The prayer for an investigation on the ground of bribery—

The committee can not recommend that this prayer be granted. The allegation is entirely too vague and indefinite to justify such a recommendation. Not a single fact or circumstance is detailed as a basis for the general charge. Neither the nature of the means alleged to be corrupt and unlawful nor the time, place, or manner of using them is set forth, nor is it even alleged that the sitting member participated in the use of such corrupt means or, indeed, had any knowledge of their existence. Under no state of facts could your committee deem it consistent with propriety, or with the dignity of this body, to send out a roving commission in search of proofs of fraud in order to deprive one of its members of a seat to which he is, prima facie, entitled; still less can they recommend such a course when the parties alleging the fraud and corruption are themselves armed with ample powers for investigation. If it be, indeed, true that members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania have been influenced by corrupt considerations or unlawful appliances, the means of investigation and redress are in the power of the very parties who seek the aid of the Senate of the United States.

If the committee mean by "redress" the punishment of those particular inculpated persons, this is a proposition to which we should all agree; but it is impossible that the committee meant to say that if the State of Pennsylvania was represented by a sitting member not lawfully entitled to his seat because of the method of his election the Pennsylvania Legislature could redress that or had any authority to do it.

Let their complaint be made to the house of which they are members, and which is the tribunal peculiarly appropriate for conducting the desired investigation. That their complaint will meet the respectful consideration of that house your committee are not permitted to doubt. If upon such investigation the facts charged are proven, and if they in any manner involve the character of the recently elected member of this body from the State of Pennsylvania, the Constitution of the United States has not left the Senate without ample means for protecting itself against the presence of unworthy members in its midst.

That is by expulsion. If this Pennsylvania case be claimed or conceived by anybody to announce the doctrine that the proper place to try a title to a seat in the United States Senate is the State Legislature, and not the court which under the Constitution is the sole judge, then I think the doctrine of the case will find very few supporters here. But if, on the other hand, the committee treat this as a vague charge of unworthiness made against the then sitting member, not calling for his expulsion, or a charge against the conduct of members of the State Legislature calling for their condemnation and proper punishment, the committee are right in saying that that investigation belongs solely to the State.

The proposition which lies at the foundation of the report in the Pennsylvania case, if it have any broader meaning, is expressly contradicted by the report of the majority of the committee here.

The only power—

Says Senator PUGH, in behalf of the majority of the present committee—that exists anywhere to try the validity of that title and to annul it is vested in the Senate of the United States.

The only power, say the committee in the Pennsylvania case, to make the investigation then sought was in the Legislature of Pennsylvania. Therefore it is obvious that they did not conceive they were speaking in regard to a proposition to investigate the title of that Senator to a seat, or if they were the judgment is clearly and manifestly wrong.

But the proceeding of the Ohio committee makes but a very small part of this case. The constant effort of my friends who differ with me is to confine the attention of the Senate to the portion of the facts offered to be shown which appeared there. The offer now before the Senate is to prove another and far different case—a case much stronger than that incidentally developed by that committee.

The evidence taken in Ohio was sent here by the house of representatives merely for our information and accompanied by no charge or request whatever. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but the testimony taken in the course of an inquiry as to whether four Ohio men were guilty of something took a wider range, and they sent it here for our information. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and by them referred to the chairman for examination, and I made the following report which I desire to read; it is very brief:

I have examined the evidence forwarded by the house of representatives of Ohio.

The investigation was under a resolution directing an inquiry as to the charges that four members of the present Legislature, being also members of the last, were guilty of being induced by corrupt means to vote for Mr. PAYNE.

These charges were not sustained, and the committee—

That is the committee of the Ohio house—

so report.

But the inquiry took a wider range. There was evidence tending to show—

That Mr. PAYNE's name was not publicly suggested as a candidate for Senator until after the State election;

That it was not very prominently suggested until shortly before his election in January;

That many persons who had been supposed to favor Pendleton voted for; PAYNE;

That there was a widespread belief that corrupt means were used to procure the result;

That one member was offered a large sum of money for his vote by another member;

That there were hearsay statements charging corruption as to several others;

That two members of the Legislature received large sums of money about the time of the election, of which they being called as witnesses gave no satisfactory account;

That the principal managers of Mr. PAYNE's canvass, namely, Paige, McLean, Huntington, and Oliver H. Payne, did not testify before the committee, but there is not evidence tending to show the bribery of any member unless as above stated;

There is no evidence to connect Mr. PAYNE, the sitting member, with these transactions;

And none tending to show that the result was changed or affected by such means;

Informed that Mr. LITTLE wishes to be heard;

That these persons kept out of State and reach of process.

The charges from the two houses of the State of Ohio, from the Republican State committee, from the convention of editors, from the ten Ohio members of the national House of Representatives, the communication from Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH, their appearance before the committee, their offers of new and largely additional proof, the production of the extracts from the Democratic papers of Ohio have all taken place since that report was made.

Besides, when that report was made there was no request before the Senate for an investigation. It was not offered in support of a request for further proceeding or to be allowed to submit further proof. It was then the whole case submitted or offered. Then what is this whole offer taken together? The Senate will remember that it is not a statement of the evidence to establish a case. It is a statement of reasons for an inquiry.

Let us see if these reasons ought to be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE, the sitting member, in his remarks in the Senate on the 27th of April, 1886, states the vote in the Democratic legislative caucus, to wit, 1 for Booth, 15 for Pendleton, 17 for Ward, 46 for PAYNE, making 79 in all. So that if that statement were correct a transfer of seven votes from the successful candidate would be required to defeat him. If seven of his votes were obtained by bribery the result would have been thereby changed. I relied on that statement in making my minority report to the Senate. But it since appears that there was also one vote for Mr. GEDDES besides those stated, so that the vote stood: GEDDES, 1; Booth, 1; Pendleton, 15; Ward, 17; PAYNE, 46; total, 80; PAYNE's majority, 12. The deduction of 6 votes only from Mr. PAYNE would change the result. The bribery of 6 votes would have affected his nomination.

I do not understand that the Republican members of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections now make any distinction between a result in a caucus secured by bribery and one so secured in the convention. The Senate would scarcely, I think, refuse an inquiry on this ground. It seems hardly probable that the case will turn on this distinction; but I will state a little more fully.

The vote in the Legislature was:

	Senate.	House.	Total.
Payne	22	56	78
Blank	8	39	47
Foster		2	2
	30	97	127

Or 127 in all, of which Mr. PAYNE's majority was 29. If there had been a joint ballot a change of 15 votes would have defeated PAYNE. A change from PAYNE of 8 votes in the senate or of 7 votes in the house would have prevented the election by concurrent vote, as it was in fact made. In other words, supposing the election had come to a joint ballot, 15 votes procured by fraud would have changed the result; and taking the election as it is, 8 votes procured by fraud in the senate would have changed the result in that body, and 7 votes procured by fraud or bribery in the house would have changed the result in that body.

Now let us see whether there be not abundant probable cause for the belief that inquiry would show that more than enough to change the result, whichever of these numbers be required, were unlawfully and corruptly obtained.

I have here an analysis of the offers of proof made by the gentlemen who appeared to represent the Ohio Legislature and the other complainants. I have the cases depending on the evidence in the Ohio testimony and other cases presented and depending on evidence which is offered by these gentlemen before the committee for the first time; and I wish to say that of course a case of this kind grows. An attempt to ferret out by legal process a transaction such as is charged to have taken place in the Legislature of the State of Ohio begins when a few persons have made disclosures. They are heard of in the public press and other persons communicate facts that they have known. That is the universal history of the detection of such things. Here is, in the first place, the case of Elmer White. He was the president pro tempore of the Ohio senate. He made a sudden change, having been pledged for Mr. Pendleton and changed to Mr. PAYNE.

He and his father were living together in the same house, as appears in the testimony before the Ohio investigation. He is one of the persons referred to there, being a man of limited pecuniary means. Just after the election a piece of valuable real estate, for which $1,200 or $1,500 was paid, was purchased in his father's name, and White himself expended on that real estate a considerable sum of money in improvements, and the father and son being called, living together, and having dwelt together in the same house, the son swore that he did not know where his father got the money to make the purchase. The father swore that he did not know where the son got the money to make the improvements, and the father said he would not tell where he got his own money, and the committee conceived themselves without power to compel him.

Mr. PLATT. Did the son explain where he got his?

Mr. HOAR. He made a statement where he got his, a very unsatisfactory one. As to that Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH offer some important new evidence.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator a question in reference to that man White?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any proof before the committee as to what White's opinions were on the Senatorial question before the Legislature met?

Mr. HOAR. It is my opinion that there is, but I will look to see.

Mr. TELLER. He announced in his paper that he would not vote for Pendleton, some weeks before the Legislature met.

Mr. HOAR. My eyesight is not very good, and I will not stop to search through this volume to answer more definitely the question of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. TELLER. You will find it on page 255.

Mr. HOAR. That particular fact which the Senator stated?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; he said:

Q. Now, I will ask you whether or not you had gone to Columbus with the intention of supporting HENRY B. PAYNE?
A. I did, sir. I so announced several weeks before in my paper.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that White's own statement?

Mr. TELLER. That is White's statement.

Mr. HOAR. His story.

Mr. TELLER. It was not contradicted.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, but on the other hand he is also proved to have received this large sum of money. It will be found that there is evidence that, while this gentleman swore he had a very warm side to Ward, but had not pledged himself to him, he was elected on the understanding by the people that he would vote for Mr. Pendleton.

Mr. TELLER. That he denies very positively.

Mr. HOAR. All these considerations will have their due weight when the proper inquiry is made.

Here is the case of Senator Welsh, in regard to which there is also very strong evidence to show a change of position and I think the receipt of a sum of money. My eyesight does not permit me to hunt these things out. Then there is the case of O. B. Ramey, the case of W. B. Tierce, each of whom was shown to have a large and unaccounted-for sum of money. Mr. Tierce was charged with bribery by a person who testified before the committee, and he did not deny it.

Mr. TELLER. That is Mr. Pennington's statement, which he denies.

Mr. LOGAN. He denies it in toto.

Mr. HOAR. It is a very strange reason for refusing an inquiry when there is a prima facie case, to say that some one comes in and denies it.

Mr. LOGAN. He denies it himself.

Mr. HOAR. Very likely he himself denies it.

Mr. LOGAN. Would he not be a proper witness?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly, he ought to be. The inquiry ought to be before a committee that has power to make him and other witnesses answer.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no power to do it. The Supreme Court has decided that that can not be done.

Mr. TELLER. None of these witnesses refused to answer.

Mr. LOGAN. Not one of them.

Mr. HOAR. Then these cases which were before the Ohio house committee, the case of Mooney, the case of Roche, the case of Brunner, and the case of Hamilton. In each one of these cases there is abundant evidence, in my opinion, to warrant a magistrate to issue his process for an inquiry. It is true that in some of these cases the person implicated comes in and makes a denial, an extremely unsatisfactory denial in some instances, and in others perhaps it would be satisfactory.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Mooney states emphatically that he was not there at the time mentioned when he and the other man were said to have quarreled about the money; that he was in the room of another person, and that other person, who was a member, states that his statement is correct.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it as the Senator's proposition that in a question where a man testifies that he heard these two men comparing notes about the money they had received, the Senate of the United States, the only court that can inquire into this matter, is to be precluded by the man's denial. Is that the proposition the Senator states?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will find out my proposition when I speak.

Mr. HOAR. But if the Senator interrupts me when I am speaking, I am entitled to find out his proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator, but he said his sight was bad and he could not see and I called his attention to the fact that Mr. Mooney had contradicted that statement.

Mr. HOAR. I remember the fact now. Those two members, as testified by an impartial and a respectable witness, were heard in their room quarreling about the money they had received.

Mr. TELLER. There is no pretense that they were comparing notes about money that they had received in the Senatorial contest. The witness swore positively that he did not know where they got money and they never mentioned the Senatorial contest. He says that positively.

Mr. HOAR. But it was about that time. Now we are asked to take their denial as a reason why the Senate should not put this case on trial.

In addition to these eight persons, Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH, who appeared as counsel in this matter, asked to be permitted to lay before the Senate evidence since obtained by them, tending to show a case in regard to eight others, making sixteen in all, in regard to whom they present testimony or state the information on which they make this charge and desire to lay the testimony before the Senate.

In addition to these eight I addressed a verbal inquiry to Mr. LITTLE asking him what number of persons in all he was able to assert had been corrupted, and Mr. LITTLE, who is a member of the other House, formerly attorney-general of the State, who represented these petitioners in their desire for an inquiry, replied:

Answering your verbal inquiry of Saturday I find the letters and documents forwarded and received by me and deemed by Mr. BUTTERWORTH and myself reliable mention twenty-one members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly by name as having received money for their support of Mr. PAYNE in caucus. It is our conviction that a searching investigation under authority of the Senate would show the number to be greater.

Mr. TELLER. Does he give you the names?

Mr. HOAR. He does not; of course he does not. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me, I will not say a desire to make an investigation futile, but a suggestion that when a grand jury or a magistrate charged with making a preliminary inquiry is considering the question whether process should issue, a demand that the names of the witnesses with the details of what they would testify to, the strength of the case should be advertised before the public, should go before a committee and before the Senate where the debates are to be public so that the investigation would wholly evaporate or would be likely to.

I put this proposition upon this ground, that a demand made from a respectable quarter like this, accompanied with the statement that the party has in his possession information from a reliable source to establish the proposition, ought to enable him to have the process; and a magistrate who should refuse it would be impeached; a district attorney who would refuse process to bring such witnesses before a grand jury would go pretty rapidly out of office; and is the Senate in any different position in determining upon this question?

In addition to this general statement of Mr. LITTLE and Mr. BUTTERWORTH, here are statements as to particulars in regard to eight cases. Here is Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH'S verbal proposition before the committee:

(1) It will be testified by the Hon. Joseph Hughes, that immediately after the caucus that senator—

When I said my eyes did not permit me to find this Mooney thing I looked for the page I had reference to but in the wrong document. But after stating the sudden changes of these persons—

It will be shown in regard to one senator that though he affected loyalty to Ward the latter was compelled to withdraw his confidence from him just before the caucus; that he was suspicious that he was being betrayed.
(1) It will be testified by Hon. Joseph Hughes that immediately after the caucus that senator deposited $2,500 in two different sums in two different banks, and that Mr. Hughes told him distinctly to his face that he had sold out and that he knew the amount he received and where he had deposited the money; that while there was an attempted denial at first there was ultimately no denial of the charge.

Mr. LOGAN and Mr. TELLER. What senator was that?

Mr. HOAR. One senator; he does not specify. Now let us understand the purpose of these constant interruptions, what they mean, what they amount to, what they are based on, what gives them any practical point at all. I say to the Senate that in my judgment when a respectable man, representing a State Legislature, the two Houses of it, representing ten members of the other House, himself a member of the other House, comes to the Senate and says, "I have in regard to one man whom I do not name now the evidence in my possession which will be given by a respectable man, whom I do name, that at the time of this proceeding he deposited $2,500 in two different banks, and was told he had sold out, and did not deny it," that is reason, so far as that one case is important, counting that as one of the number to be affected, why the Senate should issue its process and make its inquiry; and that it is not necessary, in addition to that, to advertise the name to the public and have the thing go out that the investigation may be baffled. It would baffle every inquiry into an offense like this to undertake this course.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to say that I asked the question, as I thought I had a right to do, because the testimony shows clearly that Mr. Hughes, if he ever made a statement of the kind, referred to Mr. Ramey, and other testimony shows that if Hughes did make this statement he referred to Ramey.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to the Senator's question, but I say he can only make it material by standing on a position which is wholly untenable.

(2) Another senator who was known to be for Ward or Pendleton immediately before the caucus, stated to one of his colleagues that he was offered $5,000 to vote for PAYNE and intended to accept it, and tried to persuade his colleague to do the like, explaining to him how it could be paid. It also appears that soon afterward the wife of that senator who is said to have received the $5,000 deposited $2,500 in the bank in Toledo and took certificates therefor, which she afterward turned over to her husband. That this was done, although in the town where the senator lived there were two banks, and at which the parties transacted all their business. This senator appealed to Senator Pendleton for aid in his campaign and got it.

That is Ramey. The one the Senator from Colorado says was Ramey is Elliott. I find "Elliott" written in the margin.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps it is.

Mr. HOAR—

(3) Another senator who had been a pronounced supporter of Ward and Pendleton, and in the event that if one could not receive the nomination the other should, from a state of impecuniosity preceding the nomination and election of Mr. PAYNE became thrifty, being able to pay off a number of thousands of dollars of incumbrances and make purchases of property involving several thousands of dollars, so that the sudden and extensive thrift was matter of remark in the community.

There are three——

Mr. EVARTS. Was that White?

Mr. HOAR. I do not call to mind.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator will allow me a moment. My point of inquiry is to identify the person referred to in the observations the Senator makes. Certain witnesses are named and discussed; of others the names are not known. Then you go on to comment very properly upon the evidence touching them, and you do not name the person, and our desire is to identify him, at least on the question whether he is among those named or among those whose names are not given.

Mr. HOAR. I will state in regard to these persons, there are sixteen men who are named or identified. Eight of them are referred to in the evidence taken before the Ohio committee. But there is supplemental evidence offered by Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH in regard to several of those. The other eight of the sixteen who are named—fifteen, remember, would change the whole result—the other eight of the sixteen who are named are pointed at by evidence adduced by LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH in their offer to the committee for the first time; and in regard to five more they say they have evidence coming from persons whom they know and deem to be reliable which will establish the facts about the other five whose names they do not disclose.

I did not wish to be impatient of the interruptions of the gentlemen on the other side, but I wish to say that it seems to me totally immaterial for the purposes of the point I make whether these men are named or not. If I were in the place of Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH, I doubt whether I would have named one of them, because it is not a time, when you are determining whether the proper authority, whatever it is, shall investigate an offense attended with turpitude, to advertise to the world all the evidence you have got and whom you are aiming at until the process has gone out.

That is my proposition. I put this case to the Senate. I put my own conviction upon it on this ground among others, that when complainants of this character come and say that they have investigated and find for the persons that they represent and are possessed of evidence tending to show these facts in regard to at least twenty-one persons, that if the Senate will issue its process the Senate shall not say, "We will see what you know already and try the case on that, and refuse if you do not make out a case," or "We will compel you to disclose everything you have got in your mind or otherwise, or the process shall not issue." If that is an erroneous proposition, I am wrong.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. Is not that the man the title of whose land was in his father, the land being under mortgage, and the mortgage immediately paid off and purchases made for the farm part by the father and part by the son, and both father and son refused to say where they got the money.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing of the kind there.

Mr. FRYE. That is one case.

Mr. TELLER. There is no such case.

Mr. FRYE. There is such a case.

Mr. TELLER. There is not.

Mr. FRYE. I beg the Senator's pardon, I can find it.

Mr. EVARTS. It is only to identify the person that the inquiry is put.

Mr. HOAR. Here are nine gentlemen on the other side on this question. They have insisted that I shall make the first speech, and I understand that they insisted they would have to close the whole case also. I hope they will have a reasonable forbearance in the matter of interruptions as I go along.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator does not count me among the nine.

Mr. HOAR. No; I am quite sure of that.

(4) Another senator, a thoroughly pronounced Pendleton man, was aggressive and devoted to Pendleton until after an interview with Mr. Paige. His conversion was said to have been sudden and attended with thrift, which found expression in the purchases and the expenditure of quite a large sum of money.

That is the person to whom the Senator from Maine refers, I understand.

(5) Another member, from having to borrow money to go to Columbus, whither he went as an earnest supporter of Ward or Pendleton, who had aided him in his campaign, became a violent Payne man after an interview with PAYNE's party managers; and he, too, immediately afterward, was enabled to purchase property, furnish a house handsomely, and gave substantial evidence of thrift, which was irreconcilable to any known means he had of acquiring money. He was denounced openly to his face for having sold out, and on being arraigned was unable to make defense.

(6) Two other members, although elected to represent opposition to monopolies and the influence of monopolies, became supporters of PAYNE; and as said, on returning from the caucus—

That is the matter about which I was interrupted just now—

were heard discussing the difference in the amount of money they received, each one, as the witness avers, having a certain sum of money. (Page 153; also Boyle, 184.)

(7) Still another who had been hostile to PAYNE, and had criticized with great severity the proposition to permit the Standard Oil Company to slaughter Pendleton, became, on an interview with the representatives of Mr. PAYNE, an advocate of the latter's election. He, too, gave evidence of great thrift immediately after the election, and stated that out of gratitude, Oliver H. Payne had advanced him or loaned him $3,500. (Pages 57 to 203.)

(8) Another member, according to a statement of one who was conspicuous in his activity in promoting the candidacy of PAYNE in opposition to Pendleton, stated that a member whom he named was demanding that he be paid for his vote $5,000, which he alleged was too much, stating at the time that the fellow knew they would have to have his vote and had run the price up; that it was too much and that he was going to see one of the Payne men about it, saying that he didn't want to pay so much.

There is an affidavit which was in the hands of Mr. LITTLE, which is now on the table before me, furnished by him to these facts:

(See affidavit in hands of Mr. LITTLE.) The same gentleman—it was Hon. Allen O. Myers—on the floor of the house distinctly pointed out the member as having been purchased in the Senatorial fight, &c.

Another member—

Which makes nine—

Another member who had been very loud in his pretensions in the support of Pendleton, just before the caucus, after a visit to the room in which the indications of the banking-house had been seen by gentlemen, went back with his hand in his pocket to Mr. Pendleton, shook hands, congratulated him and wished him success, and immediately went to the caucus and voted for Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. LOGAN That is in the original?

Mr. HOAR. That is in the original. Here are three other letters which I should like to read, letters addressed to the President of the Senate:

MANCHESTER, OHIO, May 14, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In a conversation a short time ago with John C. Rineheart, a neighbor of mine, and an intimate acquaintance of John B. Young, who was a member of the Legislature when HENRY B. PAYNE was elected to the United States Senate, he said that John B. Young told him that John P. Leedom, now Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, approached him and asked him if $500 would be any inducement for him to change his ballot, knowing that he was pledged to Mr. Pendleton. He answered that it would not, as Mr. PAYNE had no following in Adams County, and that it was the understanding before and after the State election that he was to support Mr. Pendleton. John P. Leedom then asked him if $1,000 would induce him to change his vote and support Mr. PAYNE. He answered as before that it would not. He was then told by the same party to name his terms in writing and leave it in his room so that John P. Leedom could get it. He answered that he would not write anything in regard to the matter in hand. He stated that after the caucus was over he found a note on his desk that had been previously left there but not seen by him requesting him to meet J. P. L. at the door before going into the caucus. Should the investigation in the Senate proceed, this man, J. B. Young, may be a valuable witness, as he also stated that he knew as much about Mr. PAYNE's election as any witness that was before the Ohio investigating committee.

I will say that my informant is a reliable gentleman and will not misrepresent. You can make such use of this as you think best.

Here is a letter addressed to this gentleman who says he told him this. It is from John B. Young himself:

Your letter received. Just got home from a two weeks' canvass, and found your letter and hasten to reply, as it is so long since I received it, will not send the letter to Governor Hoadly, as it would do no good and possibly might injure me in the October election. I am having a bitter fight here, but believe will pull through. What I told you on the train was on the square, and not to be revealed. Such revelations could possibly do you no good, but would injure others and the party at large. If I can assist you in getting your position back will gladly do so, &c.

Mr. EVARTS. What is the date of that?

Mr. HOAR. The date of that is September 30, 1885. Here is a letter relating to another case, the case of Elliott:

Your favor of the 18th instant is received. It has been rumored here for some time that Mr. Joseph B Hughes—

He is employed in the service of the country politically, a consul—is expected to visit the United States sometime this winter, but I am unable to obtain any definite information as to when. There are many gentlemen here who have heard the consul to Birmingham tell what he knows about the matter you have under investigation, and especially the connection therewith of the then senator from the Butler-Warren district, among whom I would mention Mr. David Sheehan and T. V. Howell, of this city. A score of witnesses from here can be produced to testify that Mr. Hughes has unqualifiedly stated on many occasions that Senator Elliott received $500 from Pendleton to bear expenses while doing alleged work for Pendleton; that after the capture of the Legislature and senate by PAYNE, he, Hughes, called Elliott into his room at the Neil House, locked the door, charged Elliott with taking PAYNE's money and then betraying him, and with receiving $2,500 from the Payne men as the price of his treachery; that Elliott at first attempted to deny it; that Hughes faced him down with the statement that he knew exactly where he got the money, how it was paid to him, and the different places in which Elliott had placed it for safe-keeping; and that he compelled Elliott there to admit the fact. If these statements of Hughes's can be put in the record Hughes will never deny that he made them, either on oath before the committee or in the public prints.

Mr. LOGAN. Elliott denies that in his evidence.

Mr. EVARTS. To whom is it addressed?

Mr. HOAR. It is addressed to Hon. Thomas Cowgill, Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. EVARTS. What is the date of it?

Mr. HOAR. The date of it is February 19, 1886.

Then here is the case of Zeigler, No. 12, a member of the house from Crawford County. It comes from Mr. Cowgill:

Information comes to me from C. Ewing, a banker of Ottawa, Putnam County, Ohio, that one H. E. McClure, of Ottawa, and a reputable citizen, will testify, if brought before your committee, that the member of the house from Crawford County at the time of PAYNE's election to the United States Senate stated to him at various times and places that he had received money for his vote in caucus for Mr. PAYNE, that while he came to Columbus a Pendleton man and knew that his constituents were largely in favor of Pendleton's re-election; that he became convinced that PAYNE would carry the Democratic caucus anyhow and that money could be had for his vote for PAYNE and that he concluded to and did take it. I have not been able to learn that the amount of money received was ever stated.

This statement will be substantially the same as to conversations with and admissions made by Cuff, the then and now representative from Henry County. McClure is willing to respond to a subpœna by telegraph, &c.

Mr. TELLER. What is the date of that?

Mr. LOGAN. Is that in reference to Zeigler?

Mr. HOAR. It is in reference to Zeigler.

Mr. LOGAN. You know that Zeigler is one of the men whom Mr. Cowgill himself exonerated.

Mr. HOAR. This is new evidence.

Mr. TELLER. It is proved that Zeigler did not vote for PAYNE.

Mr. LOGAN. Zeigler did not vote for PAYNE. That is the evidence here, and you know it.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator mean by interrupting me to say "you know it?"

Mr. LOGAN. I mean that you know what the evidence is here.

Mr. HOAR. I did not recall that particular fact, but it makes no difference; the question is, Is this case to be ever tried? That is the point.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator need not get excited about it; but I will state what I meant. It was this: If Mr. Zeigler was one of the parties who was tried before the Legislature and the evidence showed he did not vote for Mr. PAYNE and he was entirely exonerated by the Legislature, I ask what effect could it have to prove anything when he did not vote for him?

Mr. HOAR. The vote in that caucus, and it is a pretty significant suggestion, was by secret ballot. The Payne men against the earnest remonstrances of the members of the other party insisted on having that vote by secret ballot.

Is it enough, when a new piece of evidence from a man certified to be respectable is brought here to the only court which can ever try this case, to say that they did not have evidence enough to prove this on this man before the committee in the State of Ohio, who were not dealing with Mr. PAYNE'S title, and that he said on that secret ballot he did not vote for Mr. PAYNE? Is that any answer to this proposition? That seems to be the attitude of my learned friends who belong to the majority of the committee. When you want to have a case which the State of Ohio ask you to try they say the men inculpated deny it. They say that if you try it it will be decided so and so because somebody else who did not have the evidence that they now produce came to a certain conclusion. Who ever heard before of refusing to try a case because there was evidence on both sides?

My proposition once for all is (and if it does not stand the resolution reported by the committee does not stand): Here is the Senate of the United States, the constitutional court which tries the title of its members. There is no other court in the land that is not an invader or a usurper which undertakes to meddle with that question. Now, when a respectable complainant interested in the question, not an irresponsible person but a complainant like the Legislature of a State, like the whole of the delegation of one party in the House of Representatives of the United States from that State, like the governor of that State, like a convention of the representatives of any respectable calling, whether it is farmers or workingmen or editors of newspapers, but interested in the public affairs of that State, come and say, "We wish to ask you to permit us to lay our evidence before the court," and say through the persons whom they select to present their request and advocate it, "We have here in our hands evidence from reliable sources which will show to your satisfaction that twenty-one in this particular case were changed by corrupt means," when six only were necessary, if you take one view of the matter, to deny them by saying why this man contradicts it, and that other man looked into it and did not find it so, seems to me perfectly preposterous.

If this thing is not true, then the sitting member will be vindicated by the Senate of the United States. If all the things supposed in these constant interruptions by the other members of the committee turn out to be the case, still the more ought this process to be issued, still the more ought the vindication not only of the personal character of the honorable Senator who holds the seat but of public order, of republican government, of the Legislature of a great State, of all these individuals on whose good name this now rests—all the more ought that vindication to be made. This trial is as much due to the vindication of innocence as it is to the true and due and orderly and constitutional ascertainment of the title to a seat in this body.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator what is the date of the letter? He reads these letters without the dates. It would be more satisfactory to me if he would give us the date. I shall not interrupt him if he will read the whole letter.

Mr. HOAR. This letter has no date whatever. It is signed J. R. Swigart.

Mr. TELLER. Is it not a letter that was before the Cowgill committee?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know; I suppose not.

Mr. TELLER. It was; that is the fact.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know whether it was or not.

Mr. TELLER. I assert that it is a fact.

Mr. HOAR. Then you did not want the date.

Mr. TELLER. I did. You object to interruptions, and therefore I did not ask to interrupt you, but to read the date.

Mr. HOAR. Here is another case, No. 14. Here is a telegram from Mr. J. R. Swigart dated June 11, 1886, and read before the committee, relating to the Akron case. The Akron case is a telegram received by me on the 15th of July:

Chairman Committee on Elections:

Democrats here tell of man who personally saw money paid upon PAYNE Senatorial purchase; just heard of it; your committee only could compel him to testify. Reference, Representative MCKINLEY.

THOMAS C. RAYNOLDS,
Editor Daily Beacon.

That is the Akron case.

Mr. LOGAN. Who is the man?

Mr. HOAR. It does not say. I suppose the Senator will claim that is a good reason for not sending for him.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not claim anything about it. I merely asked for the name.

Mr. HOAR. I read the whole telegram just as it is. Then here are two additional new cases given in Mr. LITTLE'S and Mr. BUTTERWORTH'S letter, page 37 of our report:

DEAR SIR: Since our appearance before your committee the last time, we have received information, deemed by us important, bearing upon the question of investigation, and desire to indicate its general character.

First. We have information, regarded trustworthy, that a member of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly, one of the sudden converts to PAYNE, with meager means and without financial credit prior to January, 1884, was able to and did deposit in bank to his own credit shortly after the election, to wit, February 13, 1884, $1,350, besides showing other signs of prosperity not accountable for in ordinary ways.

I do not know whether it is necessary to repeat over and over again that it does not prove a case even against the man pointed at that he was found at a particular time just after the change of attitude or giving a vote to have a sudden and a considerable increase of property; but it does, in my judgment, taken with the other facts in this case, which I shall come to presently, make a proper case for instituting an inquiry to see what the facts were.

Second. We can show by a witness whose credibility will not be questioned that just prior to the meeting of the caucus at which Mr. PAYNE was nominated he (witness) was, in the interest of PAYNE, summoned by telegraph to Columbus. He went, and was asked by PAYNE'S managers what sum of money would be required to withdraw the vote of the representative of his (witness') county from Pendleton and give it to PAYNE. The question was squarely and seriously addressed to witness: "How much money does he (the representative) want?"

Third. We have from reliable sources additional information of a convincing nature pointing to bribery, consisting of conversation, statements, and admissions of implicated members and others, which we are not at liberty to state more explicitly in this communication, owing to the conditions under which the information is imparted, but which, with the other matters referred to, we can verbally communicate to you in more particular form if desired.

In the line of matter heretofore submitted we deem it worth while to give this additional instance:

Fourth. We quote from a letter in our possession from a responsible person in Ohio, omitting names:

"Our representative, ——, had been elected as a Pendleton man, and had agreed —— to support Pendleton. A few days before the caucus it was whispered that '—— had been seen.' and that he would vote for PAYNE. A telegram was at once sent from here to —— (the member) by leading Democrats, warning him against such a course, and —— and others at once went to Columbus and saw the member. He hooted at the idea that he would vote for PAYNE. —— assured Pendleton that the member would support him. —— then came home feeling confident that the member would not disappoint him."

This member was interviewed in the presence of a friend of Mr. Pendleton, and asserted his devotion to him, but was suspected and watched. As the hour of the caucus approached it was noticed that he was not present. The friend of Mr. Pendleton went to his room for him. We quote further:

"He found him in company with one of the men who handled the 'boodle,' and he was much embarrassed by ——'s presence. But he went to the caucus with ——, and on the way again asserted his allegiance to Pendleton. If I remember correctly, —— said they had printed ballots for both candidates, and that he gave —— (the member) a Pendleton ticket. But when the vote was taken —— (Pendleton's friend) observed that —— (the member) wrote something on a piece of legal-cap and then tore it off. He afterward discovered that —— (the member) put in the hat the same piece of paper; and then —— (Pendleton's friend) went to ——'s (the member's) desk and tore off a piece of the legal-cap large enough to include the small piece torn off by —— (the member). I think —— (Pendleton's friend) was one of the tellers. At any rate, he got the ballot which fitted the piece of legal-cap, and which —— had voted, and found that PAYNE'S name was on the ballot."

This member was thereupon charged by the Democratic county paper of his county with betrayal, &c.

We do not question that the facts can be shown substantially as indicated with respect to the member referred to.

Should this information not be used names and means of identity placed on record would or might lead to annoyances for no purpose. They are, therefore, not here given.

Your committee, we will venture to add in conclusion, will not overlook the fact that our showing, made in the face of a most persistent and powerful opposition of unlimited means and expedients, has been one for an investigation, and not final action following an investigation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN LITTLE.
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
Chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections,
United States Senate.

Now, Mr. President, we have, then, these charges from several distinct quarters, all of the highest responsibility, accompanied by statements upon which any magistrate or grand jury would issue process showing amplest reason to believe that a change of vote was procured by bribery and corruption in each of twenty-one cases, or if there be any particular deduction still largely in excess of the number required to change the result on joint ballot.

But this is by no means the full strength of the case. It is abundantly proved that Mr. PAYNE was not a candidate at the popular election. The offer is made by Messrs. LITTLE and BUTTERWORTH to show by Mr. Pendleton himself, and by other witnesses, that a majority of the Legislature were pledged to him. Credible witnesses are offered to be produced to the Senate who will testify that one of the managers of Mr. PAYNE'S election, Mr. Oliver H. Payne declared that it cost him $100,000 to elect the sitting member, and that Paige, the most active manager of the canvass, declared he had handled $65,000.

In addition to that they offer to produce witnesses who, they say, will testify that the room of Mr. PAYNE'S managers was like a banking-house. One witness declared he never before saw so much money together in his life. They offered to produce the books of a bank showing that this large sum of money was transferred by one of these managers to another just before the vote in the caucus; and in addition to that that new fifty-dollar bills were so rife about Columbus after this proceeding as to become a subject of comment and ordinary remark.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator think the United States Senate would ever receive that kind of evidence?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; I think they would.

Mr. TELLER. That fifty-dollar bills were in circulation?

Mr. GEORGE. Was Mr. Oliver H. Payne or Senator PAYNE either examined before the legislative committee?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. It is stated that these gentlemen were all absent from the State, that one or two of them, I think certainly two of them, communicated to the committee of the Ohio house of representatives that they were ready to go before it and be examined if the committee desired, and it is well known that Mr. PAYNE made the same offer to disclose his own books, and so on.

Here comes this case, which the Senate is to hear or to refuse to hear.

First. That of the Democratic members elected to the Sixty-sixth General Assembly more than three-fourths were positively pledged to Mr. Pendleton and General Ward, and more than a majority pledged to Mr. Pendleton. This they offer to prove by Mr. Pendleton himself, by Col. W. A. Taylor, and others.

Second. That in these pledges these members represented the opinion and desire of their constituents.

Third. That Mr. PAYNE was nowhere spoken of or known as a candidate during the popular election or until a very short time before the appointment of Senator.

Fourth. That just before the legislative caucus, where the nomination was made, which was one week before the election, large sums of money were placed by Mr. PAYNE'S son and other near friends of his at the control of the active managers of his canvass in Columbus. This they allege can be shown by the books of one or more banks.

Fifth. Mr. PAYNE'S near friends declared that his election had cost very large sums.

A gentleman whose name is offered to be given will testify that David R. Paige declared to him that he had handled $65,000.

Oliver B. Payne stated to the same person that it had cost him $100,000 to elect his father.

Sixth. That the members of the Legislature who changed from Pendleton to PAYNE did so after secret and confidential interviews with the agents who had the disbursement of those moneys.

Seventh. That members of the Legislature who so suddenly changed their attitude can be proved to have, at about the time of the change, acquired large sums of money, of which they gave no satisfactory account.

Eighth. Respectable Ohio Democrats affirm that just before the caucus the room of Mr. PAYNE'S manager, Paige, "was like a banking house," that "the evidence of large sums of money there was abundant and conclusive," that Paige's clerk declared in the presence of a gentleman of integrity that "he had never seen so much money handled in his life."

Ninth. That the public belief that the choice of Senator was procured by the corrupt use of money prevails almost universally in Ohio among persons of both parties, which finds very general expression in the press.

There is specific proof leading with great force to the conclusion originally that each of ten members could be shown to have changed their votes corruptly, and now extended by these new offers to the number which I have stated.

Now, if these things be true who can doubt that an inquiry armed with the power of the Senate to search the memory of all the participants in this transaction will disclose many other like cases? The managers of this Ohio canvass well knew what was needed for its success. They did not spend their money without an object. The presumption, not, perhaps, enough to prove a case, is surely enough to provoke inquiry that they never would have expended these large sums except to change a result and procure an election. Yet, in spite of all these probabilities the majority of the committee ask the Senate to shut the door in the face of the State of Ohio when she asks your process to enable her to bring her witnesses, and tell her to resort for justice to a tribunal which has neither jurisdiction, power, nor duty in the premises.

The majority of the committee seem to go on the ground that a case must first be proved before a State Legislature, or otherwise no investigation can be had here. So far as I remember, and if any other gentleman remembers any other case I should like to have it referred to, there has been but one investigation in the Senate of the United States where a State Legislature has requested it. That is the case of Caldwell, I think.

It is a very different thing to say that a State Legislature is a party of sufficient weight to entitle its request to a hearing, to be respected, and to say that no inquiry can be had without it.

It may be said that this case has increased in the number of cases pointed out by these offers.

Of course it grows. It is in the nature of the case that the evidence should develop more and more, but it is not a question how it has developed. It is no matter, in my judgment, what was before the House committee, or what was in the beginning before us. The question is, what is before the Senate now? What is now offered in behalf of the persons who demand inquiry? The case is be made up as it stands when the Senate vote, and not as it stood when the committee of the house of representatives of Ohio expressed their judgment.

I have read already the letter of Mr. LITTLE in which he declares that he and Mr. BUTTERWORTH have in their possession evidence deemed by them entirely reliable, mentioning twenty-one members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly by name as having received money for their support of Mr. PAYNE.

It is our conviction that a searching investigation under authority of the Senate would show the number to be greater.

Now, as to this contemptuous statement that if the State of Ohio shall make a new investigation perhaps we will act upon that, which is found in the report of my bretheren of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I do not understand the law upon which that proposition is based. Undoubtedly the Legislature of Ohio are within their jurisdiction the guardians of its honor and its interests and its rights, and their jurisdiction is coextensive with the State of Ohio; but they are not the guardians of the honor of the Senate; they are not the judges of the title to the seats here. They are beyond their jurisdiction when they have gone further than to make a respectful and proper request to be permitted to lay the evidence before you.

Some of these witnesses are in the foreign service of the country. Others are in service, I understand, out of the State.

It is said that they did not examime Mr. PAYNE himself or the particular gentlemen among his managers who expressed their desire to appear. If Mr. PAYNE were charged with any personal knowledge of these affairs or connection with them it might have been very well, as their inquiry was taking this wide range beyond their jurisdiction and beyond their commission, that they should have afforded him the opportunity to be heard. It would have been proper at any rate, but the question of the propriety or impropriety or wisdom of the proceeding of that committee seems, if my view of the case is correct, totally and utterly inferior.

Mr. President, I have stated this case as an impersonal one. I have stated it as it seems to me, as a question of the propriety of making an inquiry; and of course whatever may be said upon the other side may perhaps on inquiry and it is to be hoped will absolutely answer and overthrow all these charges.

Mr. President, I would not willingly utter a word that should be unpleasant to the ambiable and venerable gentleman who now occupies this contested seat. My relations with him have ever been of the kindliest character. I think this inquiry is demanded for his sake as well as for that of the State and of the Senate. I think it a mistaken kindness which, holding him, as we all do, personally unstained, and denying, as the majority do, that his title is brought into reasonable question, refuses to him and to his claim to his office the vindication which the instructed judgment of the Senate alone can give.

But this surely is an impersonal question. It is vital to that free and pure government without which no republic can endure. Under other forms of rule men of rank or men of wealth may corrupt the poor and the strength of the State remain unimpaired.

The history of England and France has shown that the pride of rank has for long periods preserved the sense of personal honor in a governing class who bought their constituents as they bought their sheep. But a corrupt republic, a corrupt people, governor and governed both, must bow its head and disappear from among the nations like Lucifer, son of the morning. The greatest, you may almost affirm the only danger, that menaces the future of our country is that of indifference to the freedom and purity of elections, whether by the people or by their representatives. Other perils we have successfully passed—the savage, the wild beast, pestilence, foreign war, domestic strife. Our fathers proved equal to the great task of constructing institutions of government under whose models the framing of constitutions and statutes comes as natural to every company that makes a new settlement on the frontier as the building its nest to a bird.

We have taken into our body politic the foreigner and the freedman. But none of these things threaten our safety like the recent growth of this sentiment of indifference to the purity of elections. This is the besetting danger of men of wealth. The imitator of the Englishman, who professes so much anxiety to rescue the civil service of the country from the dominion of party, hears with great indifference of the crime and fraud and corruption by which the will of the people is overcome. We can stand bad laws. We can correct bad administration. You may debase the currency; you may enact into law the worst heresies of finance. The poor will suffer and the speculator prosper for a time. But the people will learn from experience and return again to the path of safety.

We can endure to have communism sweep over the land. In a few years the laws of business will resume their sway. Labor may take the scepter into its own hand, even if in so doing it dethrone old parties and abandon old maxims. But it will learn its rights and its duties, and in the end nothing but good will come to that state whose producers are its rulers. It will respect the rights of capital. It will tolerate these vast properties, but only on condition that their owners keep off their hands from our system of free, equal, and honest elections. All these things we can anticipate without dread. But a purchased and corrupted ballot, whether cast by the people or by their representatives, will bring sure decay and death. The precedent of this case, if the committee be sustained by the Senate, will render that corruption easy hereafter where its example will be most pernicious and its effects worse.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the smoke of the lamp will not be discovered on any peroration that I may deliver here by way of appeal to carry a proposition that I may make. My appeal will be based upon the law and the facts.

I sympathize as fully with the proposition that this land shall be rid of corruption as any Senator in this Chamber. I am ready now, and ever have been, to vote to vacate a seat or expel a member if I feel I am justified in doing so by the law and the facts.

But while an appeal is made to us in this particular instance based upon garbled evidence, garbled extracts from and perversion of testimony, to do an injustice to a man or to the reputation of a man, it can not control my vote.

There are many considerations which should weigh in matters of this kind. While I may be appealed to on the one side for the benefit perhaps of my associates to do an act that I am not warranted by law and the facts in my judgment in doing, yet on the other hand I am appealed to by the knowledge I have, that which presents itself before me, of age, of honesty of purpose, of good character, and not only that, but of as deep a devotion to this Government (although opposed in political action to myself now), as any man whose voice may resound within the walls of this Chamber.

Knowing that to be the case, when I am asked to deal with the rights of that individual I want to take all into consideration the same as I would in reference to a man who belonged to my own political party, and there is no power in this land which can be brought to bear upon me, either from newspapers or political parties, which will cause me to do an injustice to a man, Democrat or Republican, where I am required under my oath to base my action upon the evidence and the law and where in my judgment the charges are not sustained.

I propose to investigate this case from the bottom, and if the Senate will give me their attention I shall demonstrate that the Senator from Massachusetts has mistaken the testimony and has made, not intentionally, improper use of it, and has used garbled extracts in such a way as may be calculated to cause prejudice and an unfair judgment in this case.

Let me take his first proposition, which is that because this Senator was not known to be a candidate until late in the canvass, therefore a suspicion is to be cast upon the manner in which his seat was obtained. That is one of the Senator's propositions. For a suggestion of that kind to come from an able man, to come from a lawyer and a Senator, reminds me of the suggestions of children when they are making mud pies by the side of a ravine; it is no higher. There are Senators holding seats in this Chamber to-day who were not known as candidates up to a very short time before they were elected. There are one or two on our own side of the Chamber. Does the Senator suggest that suspicion shall be cast upon Senators sitting here now who were so elected? Is that his proposition? If so, it is a proposition which can not be sustained either in morals or logic.

Another proposition is that men must not have money unless they tell everybody how they get it. Somebody discovers that certain members of the Legislature have a bank account. Therefore they are corrupt. Now, let us put that case a little differently. Let me put it this way: A member of the Legislature not known to be wealthy after the Legislature is over, if somebody finds that he has a few dollars of course he is corrupt. If a man is elected to Congress when he is poor and stays here a great many years and becomes well to do, therefore he is a thief. Is that the argument of the Senator? If he will apply his logic to some friends whom we may all know it would put them in a very bad position before the country. That kind of argument is unworthy this floor, that a man because everybody does not know exactly how his money was acquired is therefore a thief.

Mr. HOAR. Do you think that was my argument?

Mr. LOGAN. If that is not the logic of the Senator's argument I can not understand it. I may be incapable of understanding the Senator, but that is my understanding of it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but it seems to me that if you take, for instance, a vote on some measure in the House of Representatives, we will say, suppose a man had suddenly changed his mind from being an active opponent to an active supporter of a railroad bill, and it was shown that he was a poor man before that time and that the friends of that railroad bill had carried a large sum of money to Washington to be spent, and that they declared the passage of that railroad bill cost them a large sum of money, and then it was shown that the member who changed his vote had suddenly acquired a large sum of money, having been poor before, just at that time, and would not account for it, I think that argument, whether it is weighty or otherwise, putting all those four things together, would tend to prove in regard to whether we should have an inquiry or not; and it would be a little different from what the Senator states.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will just allow me I will answer him. I have noticed that however amiable the Senator may be he will not allow himself to be interrogated, but he injects a speech into the bowels of every speech that is made in the Senate by others if he can get the opportunity, and at the same time he becomes very irritable if anybody asks him a question. I shall not treat him that way. I shall answer his question.

I have never had the heart to believe that members of Congress or Senators, who were trusted by their people, could be bought like cattle, as some are wont to believe. There may have been instances, perhaps there have been; but I have not been trained in that school of suspicion which places every man's shadow before me and causes me to interpret his conduct in the direction of dishonesty, instead of giving him the benefit of the presumption that ought to be in favor of every honest man and every man who has been honored by his country.

I shall not go into the discussion further than to say that the argument of the Senator, even if good, would prove nothing. It only does this: It is an argument before the country that every poor man in this land, if he should fortunately become possessed of a few dollars, or a house, or something of the kind, is to be set down as a thief. That is the argument of the Senator. Every man who comes into Congress with his millions is expected to have money, but every poor man is to come here with suspicion cast upon him. Therefore he must go through the world a beggar, and if he comes here a poor man he must remain a poor man, no matter what his business may be outside of Congress, or be accused of being a thief.

That is the argument, sir, and as I said a while ago, you would have to apply it to some of our friends here to-day, men who have acquired fortunes in a few years whom no man charges with dishonesty, yet they were as poor as you or I a few years ago. Why then should you say they were dishonest? I commend them for their ability to acquire wealth, if they desire to do it, so they do it honestly, instead of charging that they are dishonest for the simple reason that they do not go to every neighbor and explain how they got their money.

Passing from that, I desire now to take this case from its origin to the present time and examine it.

I find here to-day men ready to be heard and to hurl their javelins against the rights of this Senator to his seat who have been silent here for two years without charging this man with a solitary wrong. How is it that just now, within a few weeks or months, we find such excitement in the country with reference to this matter, when it has slept so long and the men who are foremost in stirring up the excitement, not only against the seat of this Senator, but against their own friends, yet remaining dumb as an oyster during this time?

The proposition I lay down is (and the Senator then will see what my position is) that you are not merely to take suspicions and imagine that there is a probable cause, but I lay down the doctrine that in order to inquire as to whether a man's seat has been obtained corruptly or whether you will expel him from this body on account of corrupt action on his part, it must be as fully proved as would be necessary before a grand jury in order to procure an indictment against a person for the offense. In other words, the evidence must show that there is guilt; the evidence must show that there is not only probable cause, but that there is evidence to rebut the presumption of his seat in the Senate having been acquired honestly before it is competent for you to deal with this right in this or any other legislative body where the Constitution provides as it does in this case.

Therefore I say that the rule has been laid down by the Senate in every case that it has ever investigated as broadly as I lay it down now, and the Senate has uniformly required that there should be evidence produced, not by Blank, not by saying that if Mr. Blank can be summoned there might possibly be something got out of Mr. Blank that would prove that some other Mr. Blank knew something that he told some Mr. Blank that he would swear to. No, sir, that is not the kind of testimony, but it must be testimony that would be legal evidence presented before a court and which would be received by a court in the examination of any case.

Now, what is this case? In 1884 the Democratic party carried the State of Ohio. They elected their Legislature. They had a majority of 26, I believe, on joint ballot. There were three candidates of the Democratic party for United States Senator, Durbin Ward, Mr. Pendleton, and the present Senator, Mr. PAYNE. The Republicans of Ohio (and perhaps there is something in connection with this that my friend from Massachusetts has not observed) had no chance whatever of an election, but some of the Republican papers of the State of Ohio suggested the name of Senator PAYNE. Yet the Senator say ist was not known that Mr. PAYNE'S name would be pressed until at the time of the caucus. Republican papers suggested the name of Senator PAYNE to beat Senator Pendleton on the ground that Senator PAYNE was a protectionist and Senator Pendleton a free-trader. Did not the Senator know that? If he did not, let me give him some facts in reference to it sworn to and to be found in the very book from which he has been reading.

General C. H. GROSVENOR, who is a member of the House of Representatives, one of the petitioners for this investigation, one of the Representatives who may have been, for aught I know, forced into this thing upon the ground on which it has been attempted to force three Republicans to make a report that they could not conscientiously do, by assaults made upon them, was called before the committee. Let me read his testimony:

General C. H. GROSVENOR, called by the committee, being duly sworn, testified as follow:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. General, you will please state to the committee your residence and business.

Answer. I reside at Athens, and am a lawyer.

Q. It is known that you have been an active participant in Ohio politics for a great number of years, and a leader of the party, and as such a close student of the politics of the State. There is a good deal in connection with the Senatorial election of 1884, and antecedent to that, that we desire to get whatever information you give us on that. I would like you to take this up in your own way and discuss it at some length. The first interrogatory I desire to ask is, about what time in the campaign of 1883 did, to your knowledge and belief, it become known that Mr. PAYNE would become a candidate for United States Senator before the coming Democratic caucus, or in the event of the election of a Democratic Legislature, that he would be a candidate for the United States Senate?

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts will please listen to the answer:

A. Well, Mr. Chairman, I can only answer what I gathered myself from current history, and can give you a little of my own participation in some of the preliminary stages of that contest. I did not hear that Mr. Payne was a candidate during the canvass. I had no knowledge of his being a candidate or that any person was proposing him. When I first heard about it, some time, perhaps, in December—I think it must have been as late as the middle of December—I met a number of gentlemen in Cincinnati—Republicans. I met them one at a time, and then finally we had a meeting in the evening of three or four of us.

We decided then that somebody was making a serious effort to nominate Mr. PAYNE, and we volunteered to endeavor to defeat Mr. PAYNE'S election because of the supposed perils that we thought would result to the Republicans in Ohio by his election. And I may say wherein that existed as we understood it. We had made the campaign largely on the question of protective tariff and free trade. We had lost the State, nevertheless. We thought—that was the opinion of the party that I consulted with—that the election of Mr. PAYNE, himself an avowed protectionist, would be an injury to the party in the country, because we believed it would be giving a false position to the Democratic party on that leading issue that we had made in the State. The Cleveland Leader and the Herald—

Now, mark the names of the papers—

then a separate and independent paper, independent in the sense of not being merged at that time, and the Sunday Voice, edited by Mr. Hodge, had all begun to vociferously indorse and further the election of Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. HOAR. What date was that? Was it in the canvass and before the caucus?

Mr. LOGAN. Before that time he said they began to do it.

Mr. HOAR. It was the middle of December.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; that is the time they spoke of, which was before the election.

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. LOGAN. It was before the election of Senator, before the meeting of the Legislature, that I am talking about now. I will show the Senator the meaning of some of this testimony before I get through, so that he may get some light which has not been thrown in front of his vision heretofore.

It was decided that I should go—

Now, mark the language—

It was decided that I should go up to Cleveland and see if I could not pull off that Republican support from him. I went up there at the time of the snow and took my wife along, and we ostensibly visited. I met the Cleveland gentlemen and especially the editors of these papers, and did what I could to present the phase of the Cincinnati opposition to Mr. PAYNE. I presented them as strongly as I could, and succeeded in very materially changing the tone of the Cleveland support of PAYNE. I was there about the time that PAYNE'S picture made its appearance in Hodge's newspaper, and I assailed Hodge and tried to show him that the matter of personal consideration or neighborly consideration should not have any effect on politics at that time. The substance of what I had urged on these gentlemen was telegraphed to New York to the Times by Mr. [did not hear the name] as I understood, and returned and published in the Enquirer. That was about the time that I first began to understand that PAYNE was a candidate. Up to that time the discussions had all been about Pendleton and Ward. I did what I could in that insinuating sort of a way to pull away the Republican support from PAYNE.

Mr. Grosvenor, the gentleman who signed this petition under oath, states that the name of Mr. PAYNE was suggested by Republicans in the State of Ohio, and he went to Cleveland in order to deter them from supporting him because of the fact that he was a protectionist and that it would injure the Republican party.

Now, let us go a little further. Mr. PAYNE was known by me from boyhood. During the war he was a strong Unionist. He gave his money for the benefit of the Government, and his son marched to the sound of battle in favor of this Union, while one of his opponents made the Halls of the House of Representatives resound with his opposition to everything that was done favoring the Union.

There was division in the State of Ohio. There were war Democrats, and anti-war Democrats in that State called the Vallandigham Democrats, and other Democrats of the class of Senator PAYNE. They were in antagonism. Durbin Ward was a soldier, and a good soldier too. I knew him well. These three men were the candidates before the Legislature. Mr. Pendleton had been the supposed father or originator of the civil-service bill in the Senate of the United States. There was great opposition to him in Ohio, and some of the politicians in Ohio determined that they would defeat Mr. Pendleton if they possibly could, and that was favorably received not only by that class of Democrats but by Republicans, as is shown by the fact that Mr. GROSVENOR was sent to prevent Republican papers from supporting him.

When the election came on these three men went before the caucus. Mr. PAYNE was nominated and Mr. PAYNE was elected to the United States Senate by the Legislature of that State. It was a Democratic Legislature. Mr. Pendleton came back to the Senate and occupied his seat afterward. The Democratic papers that were Pendleton papers in the State of course howled against the election of Mr. PAYNE. The papers which favored him, some Republican and some Democratic, took the other side, and a bitterness grew up.

Smoke was seen everywhere in reference to corruption charged pro and con by Democrats. There was a Legislature. It was in session some months, with Republicans in it, a majority of it Democrats, the very same Legislature by which Mr. PAYNE had been elected, with all the witnesses present, with all the persons present, yet with this condition of things that Legislature failed to investigate.

I am not saying that there is no truth in any charges. I am speaking of the facts. They failed to investigate this question.

It was the very Legislature that elected him, the very Legislature where every Democrat save one voted for him, and that one of those the Senator from Massachusetts relied on as a witness to prove something against him, voted for Durbin Ward, and not only that, but he testified that he voted for him in the caucus. He is one of the senators, and the Senator is going to prove he was bribed, when he never voted for Mr. PAYNE either in the caucus or in the Legislature.

So the Legislature failed then to investigate this question. They did not find enough for the purpose of inducing them to investigate it. They went on until two years transpired. All the capital was made out of this that was possible, as parties are always inclined to do. Charges and counter-charges were made. The Republican party to which I belong made capital out of it, at least I presume so. If they did not they failed to do what every party always does in a political canvass. But when the next Legislature was elected it was Republican. A Republican Legislature being elected and convened, having a majority in the Legislature, they instituted an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether the seat was procured corruptly, or whether bribery was resorted to in transferring the votes from one member to another or from one candidate to another.

Upon what was the investigation based? It is well enough for us sometimes to understand the basis of these things in order to form a proper conclusion. A man by the name of Donavin in the State of Ohio published in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, or it was published as given by him, a charge that several members, I do not remember the number——

Mr. HOAR. Four is the number who were charged.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that four were investigated. On this man Donavin's statement the Cincinnati Commercial and other newspapers published the facts to the world, giving the names of the members of the Legislature who had been purchased, bribed to vote for Senator PAYNE. On that statement the Cincinnati Commercial commenced the wildest howl in reference to this thing ever known. The Legislature were forced, whether they desired to do it or not, to make this investigation. I do not say they did not do it properly, I shall not assert any such thing, but they made the investigation on the charges made by this man Donavin. It had been asserted that Donavin knew, and that he would come before the Legislature and swear before a committee that he knew of this bribery, how much was paid, and the names of the men who were bribed or purchased.

As I have said, after the Cincinnati Commercial had made this charge and it was brought before the Legislature and they organized the committee for the purpose of making this investigation, they sent for Mr. Donavin. Mr. Donavin came before the committee and he swore positively, as the evidence will bear me witness, that he knew nothing about it, that he did not know one scintilla in reference to bribery or in reference to any person being purchased or bought directly or indirectly. That ended the whole question so far as his charges were concerned.

The howl continued, and they went on to investigate as to four members of the Legislature. The investigation of those four members of the Legislature continued for nearly four months, and at the conclusion of that investigation the committee reported unanimously. There were a majority and a minority report, but the conclusions were the same, that there was nothing in the testimony which proved any charge that was made of bribery against either of these four persons. After this investigation the whole matter was dismissed. The evidence was then sent to the Senate of the United States; and I want Senators to mark this as we go along, because there are certain facts connected with it which are not exactly understood by the country. The Legislature of Ohio, with all their desire at this time—and I find no fault with that—did not think enough of this evidence to even print it at the expense of the State.

The Senator from Massachusetts knows the fact that when the evidence was sent by the Legislature to the Senate of the United States it was sent in rough manuscript and had to be printed here by order of the Senate. It was taken by the house of representatives of the State of Ohio. The senate of that State concurred and joined in a request to the Senate of the United States, through its president, to examine this testimony; but it was not printed. It came here like a mass of rubbish to be printed by the Congress of the United States. Now, what are we to understand? Either that the Legislature of Ohio did not regard it as worthy of being printed or declined to print it on account of the cost, and certainly the State of Ohio, as rich as she is, would not be likely to regard that trifling expense and throw it upon the Government of the United States.

After the testimony was printed, the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections agreed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is the chairman of the committee should examine the evidence and report to the committee what was found. He examined it carefully and reported to the committee that there was no evidence to be found there either inculpating Mr. PAYNE'S right to a seat or any evidence that would require the Senate of the United States to pursue the investigation further.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator may infer that my report amounts to that, but that is not what I reported. I said that evidence did not tend to show either that the result was changed or that the sitting member was affected. I said nothing about inquiring further. That is another thing.

Mr. LOGAN. This is what the Senator said, and the Senator knows very well that when that report was agreed to unanimously I may say in the committee, it was expected that it would be reported to the Senate and the committee discharged.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is mistaken when he affirms that I know that very well.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I will leave off the "know very well."

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will see himself that he is wrong. I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. LOGAN. It is no interruption. I am not like the Senator from Massachusetts: I do not get angry when I am interrupted; that is, I do not get excited; I withdraw the word "angry," as the Senator may object to that.

Mr. HOAR. I was asked by half a dozen Senators at once who knew it themselves to ask what the name was; I had to search through the document to find out.

Mr. LOGAN. They knew you understood it so well you could find it easily.

Mr. HOAR. When I made the report as the Senator will see I did report as I have myself stated, that the evidence did not tend to establish either of those two propositions. That I say now. I did not, however, report anything about whether there should be further inquiry. I did not say anything on that subject at all. That might have been inferred from the other proposition; but I reported at the same time that Mr. Little had applied to me for a hearing. It was not therefore understood by the committee that we were then to report that nothing further was to be done, but when I made that report the application to hear Mr. Little was made also.

Mr. LOGAN. I am perfectly willing to take the Senator's explanation, inasmuch as he selected several names to-day from the very evidence that he reported proved nothing, in order to base an argument in favor of the continuance of this investigation. I think it needs the explanation he has made, and further explanation on the latter proposition will be in order also.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me, I did not do that.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will try to make my own argument.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. When six persons' votes were required to be affected to change the result, and there was evidence only about four (which I did report there was evidence about), of course I should report, having only the four before me, that the evidence did not tend to establish the case; but when six new ones are brought in, making ten, the matter is very different.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has tried to argue his case and I will not say he has not done it, but if he will just allow me to argue my side of it I shall be obliged to him.

Now, I should like to state exactly what I was going to. The Senator used the name of White; he used the name of Elliot; he used the name of Zeigler; he used the name of Mooney, and he used the names of other persons who are included in this evidence examined by him, and he reported that there was nothing in it.

But he now tries to convince the Senate that there is something to be investigated. I say it does require explanation when a Senator will report to a committee that there is nothing in the evidence presented, and when it comes into the Senate he picks out eight names in the very evidence which he said proved nothing and tries to palm it off on the Senate as evidence worthy of examination by the Senate. I say it does require explanation; and when the Senator said to-day in his remarks that these men had changed their opinions so thoroughly, I will not say that about him, but if any man can change faster than he on this question I should like to see him pointed out.

We were all inclined to take the opinion of the Senator, he being recognized as a great lawyer and a straight and honest man. Of course none of the rest of us on the Committee on Privileges and Elections would pretend to vie with him in legal lore, and therefore we took his word that there was nothing in this testimony, and all agreed to it and thought that was the end of it. I did. That was our report. It went to the world that we had decided against an investigation. I stood by it. I said "yes" when I was asked about it. I said "certainly, there is nothing in the evidence." I did not say that the chairman said so. I said so myself. I took it for granted. We all said that was our report. But very suddenly something was discovered to change that report. Now, let us see what this great discovery is.

I say to the Senator—and he will bear me out in it—that there is not in this evidence taken before the Legislature of Ohio one single iota of testimony to inculpate Senator PAYNE directly or indirectly. The Senator agrees to that. If there is not, then where do you find the testimony? Show me the name of a witness, show me the name of a man mentioned by this committee who will swear to anything. No, sir. Twenty-one members have been corrupted, say Mr. BUTTERWORTH and Mr. LITTLE, but they have not given the name of a solitary one, and you profess here before the Senate that there is testimony in the hands of these gentlemen that would warrant them in prosecuting an investigation when you can not name a solitary witness that you are to summon before your committee. If you have the name of a man, I demand it. I am entitled as a member of the committee to know that. Say who he is, where does he live, what is his business?

Oh, but, the Senator says, Mr. Hughes knows that he charged Mr. Elliott so-and-so. Mr. Elliott swears before this committee that there is not one word of truth in it; yet you want Mr. Hughes to do what? Not to swear that he knows anything about the Elliott case, but to swear that he charged Elliott with it, and Elliott swears that he did no such thing. That is the character of the testimony on which we three men, Republicans as good as the Senator from Massachusetts, shall be heralded all over this land as having sacrified principle for the sake of exculpating a guilty man!

Sir, when it comes to that, when it comes to undertaking to develop a case without having a case, to throw mist and mud before the country that certain brothers in the same party may be injured, and for no other purpose, I will defend myself here and elsewhere as having done exactly what I would do a thousand times under the law and the evidence, and I hurl it back in the teeth of any man or any set of men who may say otherwise here or elsewhere, no matter to what party they may belong.

Sir, I have been threatened. Let the threats go on; they fall as broken shafts at my feet. Sir, I would rather be right and feel so in my conscience, even in standing by the rights of an old man, although differing politically, than have all the offices or compliments that you could bestow upon me. [Applause in the galleries.] There is not office nor anything else in this country to make me do a wrong to a man in the Senate merely for political purposes. I am the wrong man if that is the purpose.

Now, let me go a little further. The Senator from Massachusetts says the Legislature of Ohio had no jurisdiction. Is that so? Ohio did have jurisdiction to try this case of bribery against their members. Yes, he says so. You had this evidence against four members of the Legislature, and it was not sufficient for the Legislature to even print it, and then you want us to take that testimony and on it try one of the Senators of Ohio and expel and disgrace him, and that on evidence that Ohio would not even print.

Now, let us see whether the Legislature of Ohio had no jurisdiction. You ask us to do what? You ask us to find this man guilty; that is, to pursue him for the purpose of finding him guilty of a penitentiary offense, of bribery in violation of the State law, in violation of the right that he has under the Constitution of the United States to hold that seat. You ask us to do that, to indict him; in other words, to present by the Committee on Privileges and Elections charges and a resolution to oust him from his seat, which is in the nature of an indictment against him, to be presented to the Senate, which would be the court to pass upon his case; and yet your own Legislature did not find enough in the evidence to even censure one of their own members.

If this man's seat has been procured by bribery, if this man's seat has been procured by corruption, why should not the people of Ohio indict the men who were bribed? They do not charge that this man bribed anybody; they do not even intimate it; they say that somebody, they do not know who, Mr. Oliver Payne, or Mr. John McLean, or somebody else perhaps did it. What jurisdiction has the Senate of the United States over Mr. Oliver Payne, Mr. John McLean, or Mr. Paige, or any of these men? Suppose these men are guilty, what can we do with them? We can do nothing with them. We may punish this man, but we can not punish them. Whose duty is it to punish them? It is the duty of the people of Ohio, they having the jurisdiction. You said they had no jurisdiction. They alone have the jurisdiction and are the only parties who can try these persons.

Why have they not indicted these men? Why have they not gone before a grand jury? Why have they not punished somebody? If bribery was so rife there in that place at that time, tell me why it is that somebody has not been arrested? Why has not an affidavit been made showing probable cause before a justice of the peace or other officer having the authority in Ohio? You talk about probable cause here in the Senate. Why, sir, if there is probable cause against these men, why not go and make an affidavit and have them arrested? Why not do that? Oh, no; this is the gentleman they are after. Some man wants to be Senator and is not after the men who they say committed bribery, not the men who they say are guilty. They are not after them; they do not want to punish them. Oh, but, my friend says, this thing of bribery and corruption throughout the land must be stopped. There is but one way to stop it, and that is by indicting men and punishing them for it.

The Senator spoke of ballot corruption. Sir, in the State of Illinois, where I have the honor to reside, when men violated the election laws in Chicago we sent them to the penitentiary, and there they are to-day. It might be well for our friends in Ohio to follow that example, and if they have any evidence to indict Oliver Payne, John McLean, Mr. Paige, or Mr. Huntington, or anybody else they have mentioned, the same evidence that would indict them would be very proper evidence then to present to the Senate of the United States. But until you have somewhere, some place, before some grand jury or some court, a man who is inculpated as a criminal, do not charge men with not doing their duty here when they fail to understand the case exactly as you do.

The Senator says that the clerk of Mr. Paige swore that he never saw so much money in his life. The clerk of Mr. Paige did not swear any such thing.

Mr. HOAR. He said so.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the kind of evidence, "he said so." What is the evidence? I have read this testimony and I can almost repeat every word of it.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend will pardon me. When he is stating what I said, a present fact, I should like to get that right.

Mr. LOGAN. So should I.

Mr. HOAR. And have it precise, and not something which he may think the same thing but I may think different.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say that Mr. Paige's clerk had sworn to that. I read one of these offers of testimony to prove that Mr. Paige's clerk had declared so and so in the hearing of a reputable witness. That is a different thing.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, allow me to state it. I will tell you exactly what was sworn to:

James Boyle, correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, testified that a business man in the city of Columbus related to him the following in substance: "He had just that day came down from Akron; that a button had come off his coat; that he had gone into a small tailor-shop, kept, he thought, by a Hebrew. While sitting behind the stove, waiting for the button to be sewed on, a young man burst into the store, and, in an excited manner, ran to the proprietor of the store and said he had had a wonderful experience in Columbus. * * * From the talk of this young man he was an employé of Mr. David R. Paige. He stated that Mr. Paige thought it better for him to come down and attend to the store (Mr. Paige keeping a store in Akron, and Mr. Paige being then in Columbus working in the interest of Mr. PAYNE). The young man said he had never seen so much money together as he saw in an inner room attached to the room occupied by Mr. PAYNE as headquarters. He said that he was the one who passed the members of the Legislature in to get the money. He raised his hands [illustrating], and said the money was in stacks."

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to go a little further. Mr. Russell——

Mr. LOGAN. I am going to state that.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Russell says that he knew somebody——

Mr. LOGAN. I will state that. There is the testimony, and there is one of the cases where the testimony is plain and convincing. A man connected with the Commercial was traveling around the country; somebody told him that he was once in a tailor-shop in Akron when somebody came rushing in and said to the shopkeeper, "I never saw so much money in my life as I saw in Columbus." [Laughter.] That is the testimony. Turn to it. He said he was Paige's clerk and he was there with Paige.

Now I will tell the Senator something that probably he does not know. He said that these men were out of the State and could not be obtained. Mr. Paige, however, who is the man whom you charge and say used sixty-odd thousand dollars, was in the State of Ohio during nearly the whole term of that investigation at his own home; he was away perhaps one or two weeks at New York under a physician. He sent the committee word that he was ready to testify in reference to the whole thing, and they never called for him. That is another fact which perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts would like to have in his speech. This man Paige, who had so much money there, was ready to testify, ready to go before the committee, but they did not ask him to go, and why not?

That is one point. Now let us take another case, and if the Senator thinks I mistake the testimony I will turn to it, for I have it marked here. A man by the name of Russell is relied on by the Senator, and he put in his speech, if you will notice, a great lot of stuff about so much money being used there. Now let me give you the testimony. A man by the name of Russell, who lived in Cleveland, Ohio—a lawyer, who was a friend of Durbin Ward in prosecuting his claims for Senator—swears that the evening of the caucus somebody told him that he, somebody, had just come from Mr. Paige's room and in that room he saw bags of gold and silver and boxes of greenbacks and bags of greenbacks, and that one bag was lying on the floor with greenbacks sticking out of it, and he picked up one off the floor and Paige told him to keep it, and he put it in his pocket [laughter]; and they asked this man Russell who that man was, and he said, "I decline to answer." There is the evidence. Is it denied that I state the evidence correctly?

I notice in his report the gentleman who made the report to the committee left out the part that he declined to answer, and then the committee said, "Will you not give us the name of that man who witnessed this remarkable scene?" "Well," said he, "it was given to me in confidence." Then they asked him if he would not in some way or other let them know who the man was. He told the committee that if they would allow him to ascertain from this man if he would consent then he would tell the committee, and there it stpoped, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. HOAR. What committee?

Mr. LOGAN. I mean the committee of the Ohio Legislature, of course.

Mr. HOAR. A committee whose conclusions you think the Senate of the United States are bound by.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no, not at all. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is bound by it, because he has given evidence of it, but I do not think anybody else is; at least I have seen no evidence of any large number being bound by it.

I could go on from now until night quoting this testimony. It is all of the same character. There is none of it that is not hearsay except that one or two witnesses swear that some men said they had been paid money, and then that is denied. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke of Mooney and another man whose name I forget.

Mr. TELLER. Roche.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, Roche. Let us examine Mooney, one of these witnesses. A certain man testified that he heard Mooney and Roche in a room at a hotel late at night quarreling about a division of money, and that they had a row about it. What does Mooney say? Mooney swears that nothing of the kind ever occurred; that he was not in that room at the time mentioned or during that night, and not only that but another member of the Legislature who slept in the same room with Mooney that night swears that Mooney was in a room with him; and yet the Senator says that is merely Mooney's statement. How are you going to get at it? Are you going to take the evidence of somebody who alleges that a man is guilty of a certain offense? Is his evidence to be taken and the man accused denied the right to swear? Besides himself there is another man who was with him who testifies to the same effect that Mooney does.

So it is all the way through, and I assert here as a fact that there is no evidence that would convict any man anywhere of any offense before any court, nor is there any evidence that tends to inculpate the Senator from Ohio in the slightest degree. Nowhere does any witness testify that Senator PAYNE ever spoke to him on the subject, whether a member or otherwise, of the election, except one man who spoke to him once about the use of money, and he [Mr. PAYNE] said, "Do you suppose I would be connected with any such wrong as that?" He was not a member but an outside man. That is the only time the name of Senator PAYNE occurs as having said or done anything in the evidence from beginning to end; and then these gentlemen presented to the chairman of the committee a very remarkable letter, which I propose to read and comment on for a moment. I say it is a remarkable letter, because it is remarkable. It is only such a letter as a lawyer would write or as a lawyer would know how to write provided he wanted to get up an investigation without known facts to base it upon.

Mr. LITTLE and Mr. BUTTERWORTH came in and supplemented the testimony that has been acknowledged by the chairman to have nothing whatever in it to inculpate anybody. And now let us see what evidence they have. These two gentlemen, JOHN LITTLE and BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH, both lawyers, both gentlemen—I find no fault with them, except I think this is a remarkable letter, and I think everybody who hears it will say so—after they had made speeches, Mr. LITTLE came before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and argued for two hours to prove that there was evidence in that testimony which inculpated Mr. PAYNE.

The chairman of the committee did not believe it, nobody believed it; at least I heard no member so express himself. He brought in no new facts. When he was before the committee he gave an extract of a letter to the chairman and withheld the name of the writer. I did not hear it read; I do not know what was in it except as I read it afterward. This is their letter to the chairman:

Since our appearance before your committee the last time we have received information, deemed by us important, bearing upon the question of investigation, and desire to indicate its general character.

It is of general character I suppose, on the ground of examining a person as to whether a man's general character is good in the neighborhood where he resides. So it is the general character of this evidence.

First. We have information, regarded trustworthy, that a member of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly, one of the sudden converts to PAYNE, with meager means and without financial credit prior to January, 1884, was able to and did deposit in bank to his own credit shortly after the election, to wit, February 13, 1884, $1,350, besides showing other signs of prosperity not accountable for in ordinary ways.

That is to say, he was more prosperous than they thought he was. He has just begun to show signs of prosperity. That is the condition of a good many of us who are just beginning to show signs of prosperity; that is, we are getting so now that we can live on our salaries and are prosperous and happy while we can be. Some have a little more than that, because some have means of acquiring money which others do not have. Now, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts what that proves?

I come to you and say I have information of a general character and I will prove by somebody if I can find him that a certain man at a certain time deposited $1,300 in some bank and that then he gave signs of prosperity. Now call up that witness. The witness says, "Yes, I deposited $1,300 in bank. I did not get it for my vote; I had that much money." That is if you can find the witness; but you can not find from this letter the name of the member, the name of the witness, the name of the bank, or the name of anybody, but somebody, somewhere, at some place, at some time deposited $1,300 in some bank, somewhere, of some name, if we can find it, and therefore if you issue a writ we will find somebody to swear to that. That is it; nothing more and nothing less. It is not suggested whether the man lived in Ohio, or lived in Kamchatka, or some other place.

Now let us go a little further.

Second. We can show by a witness whose credibility will not be questioned that just prior to the meeting of the caucus at which Mr. PAYNE was nominated he (witness) was, in the interest of PAYNE, summoned by telegraph to Columbus. He went, and was asked by PAYNE's managers what sum of money would be required to withdraw the vote of the representative of his (witness') county from Pendleton and give it to PAYNE.

That is, if they have an opportunity they can find somebody somewhere who can swear that Mr. Blank asked a neighbor of one of the members how much money it would take to get that member to withdraw his support from Pendleton.

Now let us go a little further.

We have from reliable sources additional information—

That is additional to this I have just stated—

of a convincing nature pointing to bribery, consisting of conversation, statements, and admissions of implicated members and others, which we are not at liberty to state more explicitly in this communication, owing to the conditions under which the information is imparted, but which, with the other matters referred to, we can verbally communicate to you in more particular form if desired.

They said they would verbally communicate to us in more particular form if desired. I desire it. I am one of the committee. I am entitled to it. And if the chairman has it the other members of the committee are entitled to it. These men say they will communicate it verbally if required. I say to the chairman we require it so that we may know something about it.

In the line of matter heretofore submitted we deem it worth while to give this additional instance:

Fourth. We quote from a letter in our possession from a responsible person in Ohio, omitting names:

"Our representatives, ——, had been elected as a Pendleton man, and had agreed —— to support Pendleton. A few days before the caucus it was whispered that '—— had been seen,' and that he would vote for PAYNE. A telegram was at once sent from here to —— (the member) by leading Democrats, warning him against such a course, and —— and others at once went to Columbus and saw the member. He hooted at the idea that he would vote for PAYNE. —— assured Pendleton that the member would support him. ——then came home feeling confident that the member would not disappoint him."

Is not that good? I am disposed to take that. But what follows?

This member was interviewed in the presence of a friend of Mr. Pendleton, and asserted his devotion to him, but was suspected and watched.

What?

As the hour of the caucus approached it was noticed that he was not present. The friend of Mr. Pendleton went to his room for him. We quote further:

"He found him in company with one of the men who handled the 'boodle,' and he was much embarrassed by ——'s presence. But he went to the caucus with ——, and on the way again asserted his allegiance to Pendleton. If I remember correctly —— said they had printed ballots for both candidates, and that he gave —— (the member) a Pendleton ticket. But when the vote was taken —— (Pendleton's friend) observed that —— (the member) wrote something on a piece of legal-cap and then tore it off. He afterward discovered that —— (the member) put in the hat the same piece of paper; and then —— (Pendleton's friend) went to ——'s (the member's) desk and tore off a piece of the legal-cap large enough to include the small piece torn off by —— (the member). I think —— (Pendleton's friend) was one of the tellers. At any rate, he got the ballot which fitted the piece of legal-cap, and which —— had voted, and found that PAYNE's name was on the ballot."

There is the record. I am quoting absolutely verbatim what they say, and on this a monument of testimony has been builded by the learned Senator from Massachusetts that would inculpate any man on earth. It is all based on what Blank would say if Blank would send for Blank and have Blank brought forward and tell what Blank told some other Blank and he some other Blank told to some other Blank and what that Blank would say if the committee would send for Blank.

That is the kind of evidence that we are required as judges to sit upon and decide that the seat of a man has been corruptly obtained, or at least to investigate and see whether it has or has not been so obtained.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, because perhaps he is not aware of it, and he would not know that I had ever pretended to be a lawyer unless I told him, that I was once in my lifetime a prosecuting attorney. I have prosecuted a great many people; I have defended a great many, probably not as well as the Senator would, but I never had Blank for a witnsss in my life, and I never sent out Blank after Blank to have Blank come and swear that Blank would prove that Blank was inculpated for some blank operation.

Mr. HOAR. You did not advertise your witnesses to the public?

Mr. LOGAN. I always advertised my witnesses to the public, and you as a lawyer know there was never an indictment presented to a court where the names of the witnesses were not put on the back of the indictment so that the other party might know who they were.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator ever advertise his witnesses to the public before the grand jury determined the question whether they would send for witnesses and investigate the case or not? That is the proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not the proposition at all.

Mr. HOAR. We differ.

Mr. LOGAN. We do differ radically. I almost always follow the Senator, but I can not on this occasion. The Senator knows the fact to be that no man was ever put on trial in this country, or any other where civilized means were observed, without being notified who the witnesses against him were. That is one of the leading features of criminal law, that if a man is to be tried he is to face the witnesses against him, and to have notice when he is indicted who the witnesses against him are. But the number of blank witnesses that has been found in Ohio in this case is perfectly astounding!

Mr. President, having passed through that part of the case, I now desire to take up the law as I understand it and apply it. I believe that is about the way lawyers arrive at conclusions, they find the law and take the facts; and they apply the facts to the law or the law to the facts, and see what the result is, being guided by certain rules and principles and what conclusions their minds are forced to by the application of certain principles when the evidence has been obtained.

As I said, the rule is and ever has been in the Senate, and there is no deviation from it, that in order to investigate the right of a Senator to his seat there must be a charge made and facts presented that are calculated to either affect his right to his seat or to induce his expulsion from the Senate. I call attention to the case of Humphrey Marshall in 1795, the first case you find, to see the rule laid down then, and which has been followed from that time to the present. This was a case in which it was charged that Marshall had committed perjury, and hence the Senate was asked to investigate the case and see whether or not he should be expelled on account of having committed a penitentiary offense, although the perjury was not committed in the Senate or as a Senator, but in a court. The rule laid down by the committee then was this:

They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged by the memorialists why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that in their opinion the presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by the recriminating publications, which manifest strong resentment against him.

That does not apply to this character of case, and I only refer to it to show that the rule was laid down early that a man charged with an offense outside of the Senate must be indicted and convicted of the crime so that there could be evidence presented to the Senate of his guilt of the crime charged. That was the line that they went on at that time.

But I take up a case now that decides exactly the principle which is involved in this case. It was read by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], I believe. Let me state this case. A protest was presented by members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania against a Senator elected by that State taking his seat, upon the ground that his election had been purchased, upon the ground that members had been bribed to elect him to the United States Senate. In that case the Senate laid down a rule. The Senator from Massachusetts thought it was different, but we will see if it is not the same. This is a case where Senator PAYNE'S seat is contested upon the ground not that any member was bought to vote for him, because nobody pretends so, but on the ground that the caucus perhaps were corrupted. But it is no matter about that. The charge is that his seat was obtained corruptly. Now look at the Pennsylvania case.

It is a general allegation "that the election of the said Simon Cameron"—

Just as this is a general allegation—

"was procured, as they are informed and believe, by corrupt and unlawful means, influencing the action and votes of certain members of the house of representatives," and the Senate of the United States is asked to investigate the charge.

The committee can not recommend that this prayer be granted. The allegation is entirely too vague and indefinite to justify such a recommendation. Not a single fact or circumstance is detailed as a basis for the general charge. Neither the nature of the means alleged to be corrupt and unlawful, nor the time, place, or manner of using them, is set forth, nor is it even alleged that the sitting member participated in the use of such corrupt means or, indeed, had any knowledge of their existence. Under no state of facts could your committee deem it consistent—

Mark the language. They give a general expression as to what is required.

Under no state of facts could your committee deem it consistent with propriety, or with the dignity of this body, to send out a roving commission in search of proofs of fraud in order to deprive one of its members of a seat to which he is, prima facie, entitled; still less can they recommend such a course when the parties alleging the fraud and corruption are themselves armed with ample powers for investigation.

They went upon this theory, that while the Legislature of Pennsylvania charged its own members with corruption, the Legislature of Pennsylvania should convict its own members of corruption, and that their conviction would be such evidence as before the Senate of the United States would require an examination of the case, and would, if a sufficient number were corrupted, be sufficient to sustain the allegation. It was on that principle, and my friend from Massachusetts, the very time that he was arguing this case—while some friends are using all their power with friends in the Senate to prevent them from understanding the case there are others I hope who will be permitted to listen—the Senator from Massachusetts went upon the theory that the Legislature of Pennsylvania had no jurisdiction. He did not understand what the Senate of the United States meant by this report. They meant this: that the Legislature of Pennsylvania had the power to examine the question as far as their own members were concerned, and that it was their duty to do it, and their duty to present such a case to the Senate as would convict their own members; in other words, they should prosecute their own members, and bring out all the facts, and let those facts be laid before the Senate. That is what the Senate then decided. It was just such a case as this. If these men are guilty, why has not the Legislature of Ohio done exactly what the Senate of the United States said they should do in order that we might ascertain the facts?

Now, let me go a little further. I will not take up much time with this case, but only propose to examine the general principles. Let me read another case, the case of Senator Grover. Here was the rule laid down in that case:

It may be at times impossible for a legislative committee to apply to an investigation with which it is charged the rules which govern the admissibility of evidence in courts of justice, but the undersigned must be allowed to express his conviction that in an investigation into the truth of allegations affecting the personal honor of a member of the Senate, as well as his right to a seat in the body, no such wide departure should be allowed in the admission of testimony as the evidence in this case will show was permitted.

And they go on to show that the evidence should be as competent in a case of this kind as it would be if there was a trial in a court for an offense with which the Senator was charged. Let me take another case. Let me take the case of one of our colleagues—and he will pardon me for mentioning it—the case of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. This case was investigated. The case was presented, after the Kansas Legislature had exonerated him, to the Senate of the United States charging certain things. The Committee on Privileges and Elections required that specific charges should be made, and specific charges were made before an investigation was ordered. Then on the investigation—and the majority and minority of the committee agreed in their conclusions—what was the decision? The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] made the majority report, and Senator CAMERON, of Wisconsin, made the minority report, signed also by myself and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. The majority report is this:

That the testimony taken by the committee—

And I want you to mark the language——

Mr. HOAR. That was an investigation.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. I am reading the report—the testimony taken by the committee proves that bribery and other corrupt means were employed by persons favoring the election of Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS to the Senate to obtain for him the votes of members of the Legislature of Kansas in the Senatorial election in that State. But it is not proved by the testimony that enough votes were secured by such means to determine the result of the election in his favor. Nor is it shown that Senator INGALLS authorized acts of bribery to secure his election.

Therefore they asked to be discharged from further consideration of the case. Now look at the views of the minority:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were directed to investigate certain statements and charges concerning the recent election of a Senator in the State of Kansas, respectfully submit our views as follows:

We concur in part of the report. We exonerate Mr. INGALLS from any complicity with improper practices. We also find that the result of the election was not accomplished by such practices. We think that when the report goes further and finds that persons favoring Mr. INGALLS's election were guilty of such practices, it should in justice state what was clearly and unquestionably proved, that such means were employed in opposition to his election.

ANGUS CAMERON.
JOHN A. LOGAN.
GEO. F. HOAR.

Mr. HOAR. Is my name there?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, "GEORGE F. HOAR." That is the language the committee used at that time when they were trying that case. We all agreed, all the Democrats and all the Republicans, in our conclusion in reference to the reasons.

Now, let me ask what kind of a case is this? Here is a case with the same character of charges. The committee which then tried that case and made this report made the same character of report in this case. But we are censured for doing exactly what has been the rule heretofore, or I am at least by some parties.

Mr. HOAR. There was an investigation there.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course there was, but I am speaking of the conclusions of the evidence, although sworn to before our committee and some of the men brought by order of the Senate before the committee, and yet when we came to our conclusions on the evidence in that case we decided that because the corruption was not brought to the knowledge of the Senator he was not inculpated. You do not pretend in this case that there is anything of that kind. No such pretension has ever been made. Am I to reverse my former decision? Why am I asked to do it? Is it because different political notions are entertained by the Senator from Ohio to the one from Kansas? No, sir; I can not for that reason.

Let me present another case. What I am trying to do is to show the principle that has governed the Committee on Privileges and Elections and the Senate from its first organization down to the present time, and that the Senators with whom I joined in this report are in precise accord with the opinions given from 1795 down to the present day. In the case of Messrs. Lapham and Miller, from New York, charges were made against them. What did the committee report?

The last ground is one of fact. Before I have alluded to what are called legal grounds or allegations that by legal operation the election is void. The last ground alleges that there were rumors of bribery in procuring the election of these gentlemen. The allegation of mere rumors of bribery is not sufficient, unaccompanied with evidence, to require investigation at the hands of the Senate or of its committees. It is alleged in this memorial that one State senator of New York is under indictment in that State for offering a bribe to a member of the house to vote in the Senatorial election. It is due to the Senators holding the seats that the committee should say that that indictment is not for a bribe offered to vote for either one of the present Senators. It is due also to state that while we find by reports that have been sent to us and investigations had that there were a great many scandals in connection with the Senatorial election in New York during the late session of the Legislature, most of these scandals occurred before the two gentlemen now holding seats became even candidates before that body.

Therefore, sir, the committee, without going further into details, hold that the respective grounds alleged and all of them together are not sufficient to authorize further investigation, and do not make a case invalidating the election of the Senators from New York. We believe, from all that is before us, that the elections were valid and ought to be so declared. We ask, therefore, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Then also the charges were made that there were rumors of bribery; yet the committee say the majority of those rumors were prior to the election of these men. Hence because evidence is not brought forward of a character sufficient to show bribery or to show improper conduct on the part of these men, they refused to investigate the case further.

Now, let me give you a stronger case than any I have yet read. Here is a case occurring in 1873.

MONDAY, March 17, 1873.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the memorial of members of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, accompanied by a report of a select committee of said Legislature appointed to investigate charges of bribery and corruption in the recent Senatorial election in that State, and the views of a minority of the committee therewith, praying that certain charges of bribery and corruption against Lewis V. Bogy, recently elected a Senator from the State of Missouri, may be promptly and fully investigated by the Senate.

It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The evidence in that case presented to the committee, which can be found in the document-room, was as strong as the evidence here, in my judgment. It was all circumstantial, but it approached as near touching the Senator as this.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senate order an investigation there?

Mr. LOGAN. They did not. We will read what the ground was. The report was made by Senator Morton, and I believe Senator Morton was never accused of shirking responsibility when it came to investigations, because he made several while he was here in the Senate; he reported in favor of the expulsion of one member on charges, but in this case he said:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of thirty-seven members of the Legislature of Missouri in regard to the election of Lewis V. Bogy to the Senate of the United States from that State, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

The memorial sets forth that the recent examination by a committee appointed by the house of representatives of the Legislature of Missouri, touching the currupt use of money in the election of Mr. Bogy, was imperfect; that it was not full and fair, and in the opinion of the memorialists, if the investigation had been conducted with more vigor and with a purpose of revealing the real facts of the case, other and more important evidence would have been produced showing that there was corruption in Mr. Bogy's election.

The memorial, however, does not state what additional facts can be proven, nor indicate with any certainty the character of the new evidence that may be produced.

The committee understand that the only duty which they have upon this reference is to report to the Senate whether the memorial presents such facts as would justify the Senate in instituting an examination in regard to the election of Mr. Bogy, and are of the opinion that it does not. Such a proceeding is of a grave character, and should not be set on foot without such a statement of the evidence that could probably be produced as would appear to make it the duty of the Senate to proceed to an investigation.

The evidence taken by the committee of the Legislature of Missouri also accompanies the memorial, and has been examined by the committee. It is not the province of the committee upon this reference to inquire whether the judgment pronounced by the house of representatives of the Missouri Legislature upon this evidence was correct; but they express the opinion that the evidence is not of a character to require of the Senate an investigation.

And the committee asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the case. There is a case precisely on all fours with this, where the memorial of the Legislature, where the evidence taken was sent to the Senate of the United States, and that memorial asked the Senate of the United States to prosecute an investigation, stating that if they did so further evidence could be found that would make a stronger case, and the Senate refused to do it.

Mr. President, that being the law of the case as I understand it, I ask any Senator to tell me what there is in this case other than there has been in other cases that should cause such great excitement, that should cause such attacks as have been made upon Senators in this Chamber—I do not mean made in the Chamber, but made against Senators who have seats in this Chamber? I have not been in my lifetime very much alarmed at attacks which are made on me. I have had quite a number, and I care very little for them. But in order to show the intense feeling against certain individuals, which must have been nursed for years instead of springing forth in a moment, I propose to read what has been said about these Republican Senators by persons who claim to be Republicans. This does not seem to be an investigation of the Senator from Ohio as much as it is now an attack upon three Republicans on this side of the Chamber.

After the decision was arrived at by the committee the first thing that was said, and it was telegraphed all over the country, was that LOGAN had requested of the committee to keep the vote secret. It went to a certain character of papers in this country. There is not a man on the face of God's earth who ever heard me request secrecy in regard to any act that I ever performed of a public character. Yet that was telegraphed everywhere. The committee know it is a lie, every one of them. They not only know it, but the chairman of the committee himself telegraphed over his own name through the Associated Press that there was no foundation at all for that statement.

Why was that statement made about me, I should like to know? Why should I be singled out above other Senators in order to try to cast some kind of a suspicion upon me? Sir, it was done just as many things have been done since this question came up. It is thought by some that this is a good time now to kill off Republicans. God knows I am a very small one to commence shooting at first. Why should I be killed off? I am not in the way of anybody. I am not a candidate in Ohio for any office. I am not running for anything; I do not want to be a candidate for anything. Why is it that so persistently attacks are made—one day on LOGAN, the next day on EVARTS, and then on TELLER, and the next day, as these men have all been killed off, a certain newspaper in Ohio shouts now is the time for our hero. [Laughter.]

Sir, it shows that this last part of the play is for the purpose of destroying, if possible, Republicans in the Senate Chamber instead of ousting Senator PAYNE from his seat. Well, that is all right. I am ready to be destroyed. I am no help to anybody. It would not hurt to kill me off in the slightest. I have been killed half a dozen times, and to kill me again will not hurt me if it does not hurt the men who are engaged in the killing; and if it pleases the people who desire to do it, then let them have the fun, and I will enjoy a part of it myself.

I am making a speech now against myself. I propose to make a general assault on myself, and when I get through, if you are not satisfied that I am the man who is being investigated then I will come to the conclusion that I have not made a good speech. Inasmuch as Senator HOAR put in his report Democratic newspaper extracts, I will fill mine with Republican newspaper extracts. This is very amusing to me. I am going to get my letters so that I can read them and show you what kind of a man I am. I did not know until recently how bad a man I was, but I am beginning to find out.

There is a newspaper in this country—and I am a friend of newspapers, and it seems to me that they are of mine from what I will read—known as the Commercial Gazette. Friends occasionally whisper to me and say, "Logan, you had better let the Commercial Gazette alone." I am not going to bother the Commercial Gazette. I am going to read from it. I am going to use it as evidence against myself, and that can not hurt the Commercial Gazette if I use it as testimony in court.

The Commercial Gazette is a very influential paper. I agree to that. It is a very powerful paper in this country; nobody disputes that; and it is owned and edited, or has been for a long time, by a man by the name of Halstead, I believe. Mr. Halstead is a gentleman of wealth and influence. Of course it is easy for him to trample upon a poor creature like I am and grind me in the dust. I am perfectly willing he should do so, because I have no aspirations above what I am, and inasmuch as Illinois does not always ask my friend Halstead what they shall do about their Senators, and I am not inquiring of Ohio to be a Senator from there, I propose that my friend Halstead shall have all the power and influence that he has a mind to exert against me in the State of Illinois. I will try to take care of myself at home.

Mr. Halstead has been an influential man. I know in the days of Abraham Lincoln he thought Lincoln's head ought be chucked against the wall and his brains knocked out, or something like that. That was complimentary to Lincoln. [Laughter.] In 1863 Halstead thought Grant was a drunken old loafer and ought to be kicked out of society, and that every man who deserted ought to be shot. He said so. Well, that was complimentary to Grant. [Laughter.] So when Grant was elected President, Halstead thought he was a dirty, corrupt, old scoundrel, and ought not to be trusted by the people of this country at all, and in 1872 Halstead supported Mr. Greeley against Grant, because Grant was not a man to be trusted. Being a leading Republican, he took that shoot, and so he followed that on.

I came into the Senate here accidentally almost. The first thing I knew when I got in here I picked up the Cincinnati Commercial and I found five columns one day charging my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], whom I recognize as a gentleman and an able man and who presides honorably and fairly over the Senate Chamber—I picked it up and I found, as I said, five columns in that paper, written from Washington city and published with great head lines, to show that our friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was a dishonorable, corrupt man, and ought not to be trusted anywhere with any place whatever, for the reason that he had been having some kind of devilment with quartermasters and God knows what all during the war. Then I thought this is getting down home. So I followed on down.

The next thing I found in the Cincinnati Commercial was that James G. Blaine was a thief, a scoundrel, and a villain, and ought to be executed at the first lamp-post, and all that sort of thing. I did not believe it. I do not believe it now. I do not believe it about my friend SHERMAN. I did not believe it about Grant; I did not believe it about Lincoln; I did not believe it about any of those honorable men.

I did not think I was a big enough man to be hit by the Cincinnati Commercial. I never dreamed of such a thing. I came on along down and I found it pitching into some other people not necessary to mention. The other day I picked up the Cincinnati Commercial and observed to my astonishment that my name had been mentioned in it in a very complimentary way, and I will read it presently. It mentioned the names of two other greater men than myself and honorable Senators, but I will show you how kindly Mr. Halstead dealt with us in reference to this case. He is the gentleman who got up the case by publishing first the Donavin charges, &c. He in the issue of June 26 says in a very kind manner, speaking of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and myself, and at the same time referring to Mr. PAYNE'S friends:

> They have brought to bear all the arts of accomplished schemers and all the blandishments that millionaires can employ in society and politics. In the case of one of the three Senators who yesterday voted with the Democrats it does not seem improbable that he was moved by the most material considerations this side of cash in hand, and that the others were influenced perhaps equally by ambition and complacency. The yellow-dog Republicans—

"The yellow-dog Republicans;" I do not know who they are—> with the coal-oil bosses, have been baying gently for some time about the heels of Senator LOGAN, and there will be surprise in Ohio that he has not spurned the curs when they thrust their society upon him too closely.

I do not know who these yellow-dog Republicans are. I do not know what they mean by this society. I never was inside of the house of one of these gentlemen in Washington. They have not been associated with me nor I with them. We have not been thrown together.

But I will continue to show how we three gentlemen stand in the eyes of the Gazette. This from the issue of the 27th of June:

> Nobody believes that LOGAN has been boodleized; but it looks as if the glamour of Champagne Whitney's social receptions has given a crook to his weather eye. EVARTS is a railroad attorney, and from the first he has been indifferent to the regularity of the methods which landed the representative of coal oil in the Senate.
>
> The Presidential boom—

Now, Senator EVARTS, listen to this, because this strikes New York—

> The Presidential booms of two distinguished Republican United States Senators can now be tenderly laid away to eternal rest.

He means yourself and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. He has no allusion to anybody else, for there are no others. [Laughter.]

There is nobody else suspected of being aspirants for a place of that kind. Of course I do not take that to myself. [Laughter.]

Ohio Republicans will see that their graves are kept green.

Thanks to Ohio for that little. [Laughter.]

There have been the age of ice, the age of stone, the age of iron, and the age of bronze. We are now in the age of coal oil.

Laughter.]

Seven men in Washington have been found to declare that PAYNE'S seat was not purchased. Outside of the boodlers and perjurers there are not seven men, capable of telling whether grass is green or red, to be raked up in Ohio who would, if put under oath, agree with them.

That is to say, we seven men have been boodleized, and there are no seven men in the State of Ohio, unless they were boodleized, who would agree to any such proposition. That is kind and generous, coming from a Republican, as this does.

Andy Johnson's treachery—

I want the editor of this paper to have the full benefit of all he says. I am advertising it now [laughter]—

Andy Johnson's treachery to the Republican party was not more bitterly denounced in his day than the Republicans of Ohio now condemn Senators LOGAN, EVARTS, and TELLER for saying, in effect, that the purchase of a seat in the highest legislative body in the land is too trivial an affair to be investigated.

The Standard Oil Company does not confine its influence to the Democratic party.

It goes into the Republican party.

Three Republican senators had been waited upon in behalf of boodle, and consented to the continued disgrace of the senate. They have acted as the representatives of corruption in Ohio. The only possible excuse for them is that of ignorance, and we fear that can not be successfully pleaded for them. We are sure they made a miscalculation. They did not know how large a mistake they were making.

Here comes the beauty of the whole thing. I read the next extract to show, and I mean what I say, how far men will go to destroy their own brethren who are as honorable as they dare pretend to be. When I say that, I apply it to these men who have been pursuing us three Republicans as though we were wolves turned loose upon a prairie.

FIVE TO ONE ON PAYNE.

This is from the Commercial Gazette also:

Mr. George Fox, of the Friend and Fox Paper Company, of Lockland, has just returned from a visit in West Virginia, where he represented some important interests. While there he heard a piece of news in relation to the PAYNE investigation that is of public interest. He was thrown into intimate relations with several prominent individuals, some of them Democrats of high political and official connections.

Just before he left West Virginia for Cincinnati he learned that Senator CAMDEN, whose intimate relations to the Standard Oil Company are well known, representing that State in the United States Senate, had telegraphed to a prominent Democrat from Washington that only six more votes were necessary to carry the Senate for PAYNE, and they were prepared to pay $50,000 each for them.

Six. Seven it happened to be, but there were six needed to carry this, and $50,000 apiece was to be paid for them. That was published in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette. I say that any man who will publish such an infamous slander and villainous lie as that on honorable members of his own party is unworthy of recognition anywhere. There is the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he has ever paid anything I should like to know it; I want him to say now whether that dispatch is true or not.

Mr. CAMDEN. I will state that as soon as that dispatch came to my attention I rose to a personal explanation, and after having the article read which has been referred to by the Senator from Illinois, I said:

I am not in the habit of noticing newspaper articles of this kind, and would not do so now, but in this instance, when it relates to a matter pending before the Senate and is evidently intended to have its effect in the consideration of the question referred to, I deem it my duty to the Senate as well as to the Senator referred to, to denounce the article as maliciously false from beginning to end, false in every particular, false in every detail, and without the slightest shadow of foundation in truth.

I know nothing of Mr. George Fox. The article states that I sent such a telegram from Washington. Its absurdity is so apparent that it needs no explanation to this body. But if it were not for dignifying the article, which is beneath decent recognition, I would state that instead of being in Washington, I have been at my home in West Virginia for the past ten days, returning only yesterday.

Mr. President, such publications are an outrage upon the Senate, an outrage upon individuals, and an outrage upon common decency.

I quote this from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 3, 1886. I will add now that if I knew any language in which to condemn or denounce that article any stronger than I have used I would use it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am reading these extracts to show you how this gentleman has worked up the people of the State of Ohio, or a portion of them, against certain Republicans for the purpose of supporting themselves, for they are the ones who made this charge, and in order to sustain themselves on the statement of Donavin which they published they must destroy somebody. Hence their attack upon Republicans, for that is the general rule nowadays. If anybody is to be destroyed it must be some of their own friends. We never can find anything to say about the enemy, but we must attack one another. That is the manner in which certain newspapers in this country, or men who manage them, have conducted affairs for the last few years, and the result has been as the country knows. Now, I read further to show how a mean insinuation is made. This is from the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette of June 27:

There are those here, however, who go a step farther—

Speaking of what the people say generally about the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], and myself—and regard the committee's action as a case of "standing together," for fear that other hearts might be caused to ache by exposing rottenness in high places.

That is to say, we three must stand together for fear that rottenness might be exposed somewhere else. That is the charge. Now what follows?

A large crowd of Republicans are talking about hanging LOGAN, EVARTS, and TELLER in effigy, so wrought up with anger and indignation are they.

So wrought up are the Republicans of Ohio. I do not know but they may have burned them; perhaps they did after they read this article; and if they had burned us in effigy it would not have hurt us unless they burned us bodily.

There are divers and sundry other articles on the Presidential question that I do not want to read, as it might possibly have an influence upon the aspirations of some gentlemen here, because they put their names in every time. When they speak of killing others off they always put up some other fellow's pole, and I do not want to read anything of that kind for fear it might have a deleterious effect on the health of people.

The Ohio members—

Speaking of the Ohio members of Congress; this is the Commercial Gazette of the 27th of June, the same; the heading is:

WHY
DID THREE SENATORS VOTE WITH COAL-OILERS
TO PUT A PREMIUM ON BRIBERY IN NATIONAL POLITICS.

Then they go on:

The Ohio members are greatly incensed at LOGAN'S action, and say that it kills forever his chances for a Presidential nomination.

Lord, I did not know I ever had any. [Laughter.]

Certainly LOGAN'S action has been rather peculiar in the matter.

In the Commercial of the 28th I find:

Who will mourn for Logan now?

[Laughter.]

Certainly not the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, and I hope that we will not find any mourners around close by the house of my friend from Massachusetts. I hope he will not mourn for me and my other friends. [Laughter.]

Whipped spaniels are afraid of the crack of PAYNE'S whip.

That is too bad. [Laughter.]

Again we say that we do not believe that LOGAN has been boodleized.

They need not have put that in, because they said before they did.

But the extract of petroleum is wonderfully effective in more ways than one.

[Laughter.]

What a mean insinuation that is for an honorable man to make against another. If I were a fighting man I would get mad, but I am not, and therefore I will keep cool.

Two candidates for the Presidency have been suddenly side-tracked and derailed. Better that the discovery which led to this result should have been made now than at a later period.

They are glad, they are decidedly glad. Well, I am not mad about it. [Laughter.]

The recreancy of LOGAN, EVARTS, and TELLER has not injured the prospects of Republicans in Ohio.

I am glad to hear it, because we do not live there and of course our votes are not counted there.

They are fighting mad now, and when they are in that frame of mind they always sweep the platter.

I hope they will. I have always tried to help Ohio Republicans. I do not suppose they would like to have my help any further. They seem to indicate that they would not.

OUTRAGED OHIO, ETC.

Speaking of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], the Commercial Gazette says:

He seemed for a time a promising figure, and so did Senator LOGAN; but the two, since their vote for the coal-oil crowd of Ohio, have passed away.

We are beyond the vale; good-by. [Laughter.]

POLITICALLY DEAD,
SEEMS TO BE THE GENERAL IMPRESSION REGARDING EVARTS AND LOGAN.

The general feeling of indignation against these men still growing, and so on.

I have here about one hundred other extracts of the same character. I will not, however, encumber the record further from the Gazette.

The State Journal of Ohio has a few remarks of a similar character, and the Dayton Journal also, excepting that they are more complimentary to some other people, whose names I do not wish to mention, than they are to us.

I wish to follow that up to show further what this paper has done by its persistent assaults, of which we do not complain, or in what a complimentary way we have been treated by certain people.

GOOD HOPE, OHIO—

That is a good name anyhow. [Laughter.]

The Blaine and Logan Club at their meeting Saturday night changed its name from Blaine and Logan to Blaine—

I was looking to see if they had not put somebody else's name in there, but they did not. [Laughter.]

They also adopted resolutions not at all complimentary to yourself, TELLER, and EVARTS. The club has no use for such "cattle" as you three are.

Signed—

F. D. JONES, Secretary.

We have got down from the high pinnacle upon which our friend Halstead had us to cattle. [Laughter.]

Now I want to read to show how much we are in favor with certain people in Ohio, and I do this for the purpose of showing what determination there is with certain politicians. I do not speak of the people of Ohio; there is not a better class of people on the earth in my judgment than they are, and I am not saying anything about these gentlemen either except what they say themselves. If by saying these things about their own friends gives them commendation in the country I am perfectly willing they shall have it. But the lieutenant-governor of the State has I think overshot the mark a little in a letter to me, and I am going to read it if he is lieutenant-governor, because when men have a mind to stab others I think, in order that it may have its proper influence and do the damage it was intended, the public ought to know it, and then it can have its effect. It is an extract from a letter written June 26, 1886:

I do not think I make the assertion too broad when I say that your vote upon that question will be disapproved by every Republican in Ohio, not a purchased and hired defender, and by a large majority of the Democratic party of the State.

There have been so many charges of tampering and corruption with those whose duty it was to investigate that I should say to you frankly that such charges have also been made against the committee of the Senate charged with determining this question of an investigation.

I am free to say that matters which have come to my knowledge have led me to believe the "coal-oil gang" believed their money sufficient to protect them under all circumstances and no one was too high or exalted to have his price.

That is a pretty broad insinuation against us gentlemen coming from the lieutenant-governor of Ohio:

To such an end and to such a point had they come that the debauching of Legislatures in the securing of votes they regarded as the easiest of their conquests.

To say that Ohio is astonished at the report of the vote brought by telegraph from Washington, that the Senate committee by a vote of 7 to 2 had determined not to investigate, is to put it very mildly indeed, and the telegraph report says you desired the vote kept secret.

That was the dispatch which went out.

How at variance with your accustomed fearlessness and manliness is that. I do not wonder much at that, and that any one who votes to permit a man to keep his seat in the United States Senate after it has been purchased by infamy, corruption, and outrage should desire his vote kept secret is but part of the eternal fitness of things.

It is strange that the Democratic caucus which nominated HENRY B. PAYNE, which was purchased by so much money and evidenced by so much corruption, should also have desired the votes of that caucus kept secret after it had venally declared in favor of its purchaser.

I mention this simply as an unfortunate coincidence. I read it merely to give the lieutenant-governor of Ohio the benefit of all he has said in reference to myself. If it can do him any good I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. EVARTS. What is his name?

Mr. LOGAN. Robert P. Kennedy. He is now the lieutenant-governor and presiding officer of the senate of the State of Ohio. He is a gentleman of high position, and I read his letter merely to let the country know what his opinion is of us gentlemen. As I said, if he derives any benefit from it he is entiled to it, for I have no criticism to make, only that I am sorry a man holding as high a position as that should resort to the use of that character of language against men who are certainly as good as himself.

It may strike some people as being very strange that I should read these things when they are such severe attacks upon myself, but I do it for the purpose of showing the malignity that there is behind this thing on the part of certain individuals here and certain Republicans. I do it to show the character of the attack that is made upon Republicans by Republicans for the purpose of their destruction. I do it for the purpose of showing that men who do that do not desire the success of the Republican party. Men who will resort to such vile attacks as these are men who do not desire your success, but they desire the destruction of certain men who do not answer to their beck and call.

Sir, I will not say what word was sent to me. If I had bowed to the demand and been made to violate my conscience I would, perhaps, have been complimented highly; but, sir, I would rather never be permitted to let my tongue lisp another word than to be driven by any man behind a newspaper or otherwise to do that which I do not believe is right, merely for the praise that might be sounded through the land about my action. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Now, let me go a little further. I never have had aught against this man Halstead. Why should he pursue me in this manner? Why should he pursue the Republicans with whom I join in this report in such a manner? Is it done to affect the seat of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE]? No, sir, that is not the reason. It is not that. It is to drive the Republicans of the Senate against us out of fear that they may be crucified and crushed in this country. That is the object and none other.

Sir, the downfall of many men has been brought about by the calumnies which have been heaped upon them. After Grant passed away the slanders which were in that paper against him turned in a night into encomiums bright and beautiful. They were gilded so that they attracted the attention of every one who perused the paper; but still the memory lingered that there was a time when those encomiums were not used, and when the foulest language that could be used by pen or tongue was used to destroy that man's high reputation before this great people.

So, as I said, it spoke of my colleague on the last Republican ticket, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] before me knows, for he and I were side by side in Cincinnati when that paper's fulminations every morning were as though Blaine had been a criminal and had been convicted of every crime known in the catalogue of crimes; and not only that, but they were strewed in the streets, so that every man could see them. How is it now? Now it is all changed in that paper, and I am glad of it. I am glad that they have come to the conclusion that they were wrong and are willing now to do a man justice; but it only proves that the man who does this act, and has been continuously doing it for years, is willing to crush men until they will at least in some way or other submit to his dictation. If we three men had submitted we should have received the encomiums of this gentleman, Murat Halstead, of Cincinnati, now perhaps establishing himself in some other place larger and broader, the more easily to bear his colossal strides.

In order that there may be no mistake about what I say I will ask the Secretary to read the lettter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE CINCINNATI DAILY AND WEEKLY COMMERCIAL,
Fourth and Race Streets, Cincinnati, February 19, 1863.

MY DEAR SIR: I wrote you a somewhat fantastic letter the other day. But that I suppose is not now strange. I write this morning to send you a copy of a private letter I have from our army in front of Vicksburg. It is from a close observer, who endeavors to tell the truth:

"There never was a more thoroughly disgusted, disheartened, demoralized army than this is, and all because it is under such men as Grant and Sherman. Disease is decimating its ranks, and while hundreds of poor fellows are dying from small-pox and every other conceivable malady, the medical department is afflicted with delirium tremens. In Memphis small-pox patients are made to walk through the streets from camps to hospitals, while drunken doctors ride from bar-rooms to whore-houses in Government ambulances. * * * How is it that Grant, who was behind at Fort Henry, drunk at Donelson, surprised and whipped at Shiloh, and driven back from Oxford, Miss., is still in command?"

Governor Chase, these things are true. Our noble Army of the Mississippi is being wasted by the foolish, drunken, stupid Grant. He can't organize or control or fight an army. I have no personal feeling about it, but I know he is an ass.

There is not among the whole list of retired major-generals a man who is not Grant's superior. McClellan, Frémont, McDowell, Burnside, Franklin, even Pope or Sumner, would be an improvement upon the present commander of the Army of the Mississippi. Will you wake up some of these days and find we have no Army of the Mississippi?

Then there is awful discouragement at the way the foolish old Hunter, who is thought to be a great man because he is not insane in his prejudices on the negro question, is doing. In God's name, what is he waiting for? More re-enforcements! Pity he can't die and get out of the way as Mitchel did.

But to stop this sort of growling and come to something more practical.

The army West and East is being weakened hourly by desertions. It is the great evil. The thing needful to stop it is for the President to give each commander of departments power to shoot deserters. They must be shot by the dozen. The President's weak, puling, piddling humanitarianism is death and hell to the Army. Can't you take him by the throat and knock his head against a wall, until he is brought to his senses on the war business? I do not speak wantonly when I say there are persons who would feel that it was doing God service to kill him, if it were not feared that Hamlin is a bigger fool than he is.

And yet the pitiful Congress twaddles weekly in private caucus about political matters, as if a little more nigger would do everything. Why don't they pass your finance measure, and the conscript act, and mind their own business?

The proclamation is a positive nuisance to every truly loyal man in the West. It is a weapon in the hands of the Butternuts. If it is made a party test Vallandigham would be elected governor of Ohio. Do not think I am talking at random. Alas! I know what I am talking about. What is wanted:

1. A general for our Army of the Mississippi.
2. Deserters shot by order of commanders of departments.
3. Less dependence upon the nigger and more on the white man.
4. The consolidation of the fragments of regiments.
5. Arrest and try Henry May and Wendell Phillips for treason.
6. Suppress the New York Tribune and New York World.

M. HALSTEAD.

Governor CHASE.

Mr. LOGAN. Those were the views of the gentleman in 1863 who is now expending his force in giving his views about three Senators. If he has missed us three as far as he did in reference to the gentleman he was writing about then, I think we ought to be satisfied.

There is one other thing I remember very well. About the time that James A. Garfield, now dead and mourned by this country, was talked of and whispered around Chicago, there are plenty of men within the sound of my voice who remember well the beautiful character this man was giving him around among the delegates at that time—a reputation that would even darken the one that he has given to us.

This gentleman has not even forgotten the last thing that is to be done to the dead, because we three are dead, he says, and I take it for granted that he knows I wish to show that he gives us decent burial. He says he wants us "to see ourselves as others see us." That is the condition he has got us in now [exhibiting an illustration], EVARTS, TELLER, and LOGAN wrapped around with coal-oil snakes all over. [Laughter.] So he does not even forget us in the last agonies.

Halstead says I have no friends in Ohio. I am sorry for that. Not that I expect anything, but merely because I like to have friends.

I remember very well that in 1867 a wail came from the State of Ohio to the lakes up in Minnesota. I was there, having gone there with a sick child. I was telegraphed for day after day, until finally I consented to go to Ohio. I left my wife and sick child and went to Ohio. There was a question then about the governorship of that State. I spent six weeks in that State. I spoke every day save Sunday. It cost me a spell of sickness, but it did not cost Ohio anything. The governor was elected by 1,300 majority. I do not know that I gained a vote, but he wrote me a letter saying that I did. That was enough. I cared for nothing else. From that day to the present there has hardly been a campaign in Ohio in which I have not participated and gone over that State at the request of friends. I ask no return for it. I never have. I never ask any one to do anything for me because I have tried to help them.

We in Illinois have never asked Ohio to come and help us. If we had, of course Ohio would have responded; but we never required it. We have always been able to take care of ourselves. I did suppose, at least, that they would allow me to have one friend in the State. I have one cousin living there, and I did not know but they would permit him, at least, on account of that relationship, to be my friend hereafter. So I hope that Murat Halstead will allow me to have at least one friend. I hope I have more, and I think I have. I think I have more friends in Ohio to-day than he has. Not only that, but I will say to these gentlemen who are attacking me—and when I say "me" I mean attacking our committee and attacking me personally—that I am willing to go to the city of Cincinnati to-morrow and call a jury of twelve lawyers, I do not care where you pick them, and go before that jury with those who have made these attacks in persecution of me, and discuss this case with them; and if that jury will not decide that we three Republicans, in conjunction with those who have made the majority report, have decided this case according to the law and the facts as presented to us, I will quit public life.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to the evidence in this case spoke of the want of jurisdiction of the Legislature to obtain certain testimony as certain persons were out of the State. I have in my hand the statement made in reference to Mr. Hughes, showing that the evidence of Mr. Elliott contradicts that statement. I have the statement of the man who managed the affairs of Mr. Pendleton, in which he denies that there is any such accusation against Mr. PAYNE or anybody else. I have the statement of John R. McLean, who says that in the latter part of March, more than four weeks before the committee closed its labors, he caused Chairman Cowgill to be notified that he was about to visit Ohio and would appear before his committee at any time he would designate, and to this Mr. Cowgill replied that he would let him know when he was needed.

When Mr. Cowgill answered Mr. McLean and said he would let him know if he was needed, I ask why it is that this part of the evidence could not have been obtained? If Mr. John R. McLean spent the amount of money that it is charged he did, why did not the committee let him come before it and testify? When he wrote to the chairman and said he was ready to appear and testify, why did they not request him to do it? I know, although I am not much acquainted with John R. McLean nor have I seen him since this Congress has been in session to my recollection, yet I know from what I have learned that he would prove no such fact.

What else? Let us take David R. Paige. David R. Paige states that he notified the committee that he was in the State the whole session, with the exception of about a week, and gave them notice that he was there, but they failed to let him come before them.

So it is with all these charges made in reference to these men. They have shown their willingness to come forward, yet you deny them the right; but the thing is to be kept before the country for the purpose, if possible, of injuring somebody, perhaps Republicans in preference to Democrats. If we are to be ground to death in this mill I want it to be done in fairness and in justice, and not by garbled statements, or misstatements, misconstructions, or anything that is unfair in dealing out justice between man and man.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator appeals to me when he makes that statement. He is aware, I suppose, that I made the same statement.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HOAR. I said two of these gentlemen had applied to go before the committee. I did not give the two names.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not hear that remark of the Senator. If I had, I should have said so.

Now, Mr. President, what are we asked to do? We are asked to investigate this case for a purpose. For what purpose? For the purpose of declaring the seat of Senator PAYNE vacant, or for the purpose of expulsion. For the purpose of making that investigation the rule of the Senate laid down in ten or twelve different cases is so plain that any man ought to understand that we must have facts, indubitable testimony—I will not use the word "indubitable," but proper testimony, which would be received by a court in order to convict a man, in order to convince our minds of facts upon which we can act before we are required or even expected to make an investigation.

Ohio is a great State, I admit; I am proud of it as one of our great sister States; but that State has duties to perform as well as we have. If you find men who are criminals in your State, who violate your laws, it is your duty to arrest them and prosecute them and according to the theory of the Senator from Massachusetts that upon probable cause we should act, upon probable cause you should act. If your members have been guilty of bribery, indict them, prosecute them, and convict them. If any man in your State has been guilty of bribing a member of the Legislature, indict him, prosecute him, and convict him. If these men have violated your law, you have a statute law in Ohio against bribery, punishing it by fine and imprisonment. Why not execute your law?

If you say the bribery was in a caucus, why not indict the guilty parties? You have a statute under which you can do it. Why not punish them? Why not try them? You can do it, but you fail. If you have the character of evidence to do it and do it, then with some show of earnestness, some show of right, some show of justice, some show of having performed your part in reference to this matter you can then ask that we shall act in reference to the Senator who holds his seat here.

Indict these men and bring that testimony to us and we can act. The door is not closed against the action of the committee or the Senate at any time. It is always open as long as a member retains his seat on this floor. But when you demand that it shall be opened, you have got to produce the evidence on which we can act for that purpose. You have not done it. When you find fault with men for not complying with your wishes, you had better turn your attention to that which you can do, if what you say is true, at home, before you ask Senators here to do that which you yourselves refuse to do.

Sir, it will not do for the people of the States to come to the Senate or Congress all the time when they themselves can perform the act much easier and with more facility than we can do it. We have jurisdiction only of the Senator; you have jurisdiction of every bribed member, if there has been one bribed; of every one who has bribed a member of the Legislature if any man has bribed one, and the evidence is about you in your State, in the towns, in the places where the act was performed. You have grand juries, you have courts; why have you not acted? Why do you appeal to us, and with that appeal make such vile attacks as have been made here upon men who have been your friends, upon men who have stood by you, upon men who have loved your State, upon men who have stood by your State whenever called upon and by your people? Why should these villainous attacks be made upon such men as they have been made upon, on your own friends, when you fail to perform the duty that you may yourself do under your own law?

I tell you, Mr. President, this does not mean alone, as I have said, the seat of the Senator. I love this Republic, I love the institutions of my country. I am in favor of the rights of every American citizen upon the broad plane of equality before the law. I am in favor of every man having a fair trial and every man being dealt justly by. I would go as far to perpetuate these grand and glorious institutions as any living man. I would go as far to stamp out crime as any man. I would go as far against corruption in this body, or any other, as any Senator will.

I will go further than these men who throw mud on me to give honor and credit to this people and to stamp out corruption wherever it may be found. But when they appeal to me through the law they must do it by the law. When they ask me they must come up to the measure themselves before they require others to come up to it. They must bring the evidence, they must bring the facts, they must come right, and I say to them now Mr. Halstead can not bully any member of that committee who has not been bullied in any way; and I will not say that any one has been, for I do not believe it; but those men whom he has attempted to bully he can not bully and need not try it, and it will be a failure when he does. It has always failed when the attempt has been made to bully any man who has manhood in him.

I said I would sink in my place, I would cease speaking and existing, if need be, before I would be driven by him or anybody connected with him to do an act that would be ungenerous, unkind, unlawful, merely that I might become the pet of somebody for a few minutes and be crucified the next day by some person, which would be the result.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say that I was guided in this case not by impulse, not by being aggravated—for these attacks came after the decision of the committee—but by a calm and deliberate examination of the testimony and the law in the case. This is the fifth time I have been called upon to investigate the right of Senators to seats. It is the fifth report I have joined in making on such questions. I have assisted investigating some and have refused in others, and this decision is just such a decision as I have made with my co-committeemen heretofore on the same line under the same circumstances, governed by the same character of evidence on the same principles, so that whatever may be said by any one I myself can lay my hand upon my breast and say I have done my duty and by that act I shall stand; it is right, it is just, it is proper. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Occupants of the galleries must refrain from all demonstrations.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I have just opened a dispatch which has been sent to me by one of the persons named in the charge which has been made, and although the language is not exactly the kind that might always be considered mild, I will ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 21, 1886.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN:

Have just read BUTTERWORTH'S statement, as given in report of your committee. When he says that I ever showed a book on the floor of the Ohio house and charged members being bought he is either an ignorant or a willful liar. His malicious and reckless lying is only a sample of the general misstatements in the Payne case.

ALLEN O. MYERS.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and amendment, and has appointed Mr. WILLIS, Mr. BLANCHARD, and Mr. T. J. HENDERSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

BRIDGES OVER WILLAMETTE RIVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 901) to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses, which were in line 3, after the word "That," to insert the words "the consent of the Government is hereby given to," and in line 5, after the word "Oregon," to strike out the words "be authorized and permitted;" so that the section will read:

That the consent of the Government is hereby given to the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of Oregon, to build railroad bridges across the Willamette River, south of Oregon City, at such point as it may select, and across such other navigable streams or sloughs within the State of Oregon as it may be necessary to bridge along the line of said railroad or along the line of any of its branches.

Mr. DOLPH. The amendments are merely in the phraseology of an immaterial part of the bill, and I move that the Senate concur. I am authorized by a majority of the Committee on Commerce to make the motion.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendments should have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments have been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I have no objection.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at 3 o'clock p. m. July 28, 1886.

Mr. ALLISON. I move the reference of that resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives this day were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 1411) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River opposite to or within the corporate limits of Nebraska City, Nebr., approved June 4, 1872;

OHIO SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the reports of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Senator PAYNE, of Ohio.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, a question involving a seat in the United States Senate is one, it seems to me, of sufficient importance to require the Senate to listen to any discussion of or concerning the right of the sitting member. Whoever may speak upon the subject ought to speak from a calm and dispassionate standpoint. There should be neither politics nor prejudice nor passion in it. It is not a question to be lightly handled. It is not a question of indifference to this body or to the people of the State whose member's seat is attacked; nor is it a question of indifference to the whole people of the United States. No more important question can be presented to the American Senate than the question of a right to a seat in this body. It ought, as I said before, to be discussed with judicial fairness.

I do not allow the Senator from Massachusetts by his impassioned appeal in behalf of a pure ballot, in behalf of pure elections, to this body to put me and my associates on this committee in the category of denying the principles that he enunciates. It is an unfair, unsenatorial, unjudicial position to attempt to put this committee in. Every man on this floor holds his seat by the same right and with the same title that any other man does. There is a presumption—unless by his conduct he has forfeited that presumption—that every act which he commits on this floor, every sentiment which he utters comes from as pure and clean motives as the acts and utterances of any other Senator, no matter whence he may come, and I repeat, measuring my words, that it is unsenatorial, it is unfair, and it is unjudicial for the Senator to attempt to put the majority of the Republican members of this committee in the category of looking upon corruption in reaching this body with approbation.

Mr. President, when this case came into the Senate I regarded myself as a judge. A long life of active practice in the law had made me familiar with dealing with questions of fact, whether I had become expert in dealing with questions of law or not. When this case came here I endeavored to take it as a judge would take it, to treat it as a court would treat it, and in that temper, so far as I can, I mean to treat it to-night. I am not on trial. I have no defense to make either to the people of Ohio or to any other portion of this country for acts done with deliberation, with thought, and with honest motives in this body. I shall endeavor to show that in the line of precedents established here the committee have kept steadily and sturdily and truthfully. There is not in the legal line of inquiries that have been made a single ruling in this body that will justify the position taken by the minority.

This case came here not from the State of Ohio, and I want to controvert the statement so frequently made by the Senator from Massachusetts that Ohio had demanded something at the hands of the Senate. Ohio has demanded nothing, either by the member who sits here by the side of him whose seat is attacked, or by her Legislature, in the proper and direct method by which such a State should act. Immediately upon the election of Mr. PAYNE there were charges of corruption, of bribery.

They found their way into the public press, and to my astonishment, when the minority report came in here, I learned that they had found their way, more than two years and a half after they had been published, in a document of this body; and we are told by the chairman of the committee, who is responsible for the minority report, that those things alone are sufficient to justify this body in taking up and investigating the question whether that seat was secured in a proper manner or not. If that is so, somebody somewhere has been derelict that no movement was made for thirty months after the Senatorial election, or nearly that length of time.

I shall not refer to the other members of the committee who do not agree with me in conclusions as counsel for the sitting member. I shall treat the honorable chairman as actuated by the same high and honorable purpose that actuates me when I approach the discussion and the determination of such a question.

In January last, or some time last winter—I shall not be particular as to the date—there was a charge made in the public press of Ohio——

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of my friend whether he supposes that the slip of the tongue which I made in speaking inadvertently of gentlemen here as counsel should be brought up. It was the accident of an old lawyer, and I should like to say, if my friend would pardon me, that I made that slip of the tongue once in a Congregational council referring to something that had been said by a minister who had preceded me in a speech, absolutely without the purpose or idea of referring to anybody as counsel. It was a mere slip of the tongue, which I think I have heard other lawyers in the Senate make forty times.

Mr. TELLER. During the last winter there was published in the press of the State of Ohio a charge against four members of the Legislature who had also been members of the preceding Legislature that had elected the sitting member. The house of representatives, then composed of a majority of Republicans, thought that was a proper question of inquiry, not with reference to the Senatorial election, but with reference to the conduct of their own members, and with that purpose they instituted the inquiry which has been usually known as resolution 28.

If the Legislature of Ohio or the committee had confined themselves exclusively and entirely to the question of the guilt or innocence of those four members of the Legislature, there might have been some propriety in saying that there had been no investigation into this question at all, but they declare in the most emphatic manner that they had not only investigated as to those members, but they had investigated as to all other members who were members of the Sixty-sixth General Assembly which elected the sitting member.

After weeks of careful attention they made a report to the house of representatives of the Legislature of Ohio. They came there and said after all our inquiry we find the charge upon which this investigation was based to be false. We do not find that these four members charged in the Commercial Gazette, or whatever paper it may have been, guilty of anything whatever. They exculpated them from all possible connection with bribery or crime.

I know it is said that they had no jurisdiction to go further than that, but they did go further than that, and nobody questioned their jurisdiction, nobody denied their right to send a summons, nobody declined to obey the precepts that they sent out, nobody denied their right to investigate, to ask any and all questions because there was a doubt of their jurisdiction. The honorable chairman has said that in some instances witnesses declined to answer. I assert with a perfect knowledge of all that appeared before that committee that no witness ever declined except one, and that was a lawyer by the name of Gunning, who said when they asked him a question, "I think that is beyond your province," not because it was investigating the Senatorial question but because he said as a lawyer he knew it was not evidence.

Nobody refused to testify upon a single question that was pertinent or proper to the investigation of the title of the sitting member to a seat in this body. One witness said he would not tell the name of one man who had given him some information. One man said he declined to state where he got the property, and as he was neither a senator nor a member of the house, and had had no connection with the Legislature, nobody will pretend that this body if they had him here to-day could compel him to answer. I shall speak of that in the course of my remarks, and I think he was justified in declining to answer.

When that testimony came before the Legislature of Ohio, as has been said by the Senator from Illinois, so lightly did they regard this matter that they did not even print the evidence. They sent it here without recommendation and without suggestion, save that they thought there was sufficient surrounding the election to justify them in sending it here. When that came to the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

How was the Committee on Privileges and Elections to act? Was it a question of politics? Was it a question as to what would be the effect upon the election in Ohio or somewhere else? Or was it a question that each man for himself must determine under the solemnities of his oath and with relation to the high position that he held as a member of this body? What has public newspaper clamor, what have the ravings of the press to do with a question of that kind when it comes to the American Senate? Have we reached that stage of moral decay that the United States Senate is to be bullied by the ravings of a political press?

This committee took up the case with earnestness and with a desire to do justice not simply to the sitting member, but to Ohio and to this body and to all the people of this land, as it was their duty to do, not as politicians, but as members of this body. We sent it to the chairman of the committee for his opinion. That opinion has been read here to-day. So important a question, involving such great principles, I did not myself trust to any man. I took the testimony and I carefully read it, and I have read it and reread it. I am quite willing that the chairman shall do what he declined to allow me to do, catechise me upon any part or parcel of that testimony. I know what it contains, and I know that it does not rise to the dignity of evidence in court cases; and even what was asserted here to be inculpating testimony against the sitting member is absolutely disproved and destroyed and would not be listened to by the Senate a moment if the Senate could take up the testimony and read it letter by letter and give it that consideration which the Senate I know can not do but which the committee were compelled by their oaths to do.

When the chairman said to us, "There is an end of the case; there is nothing to be done"—for that is what he said in substance, and it is in the record and I do not need to repeat it—and when, as has been before stated on this floor, the committee supposed their labor was ended, respectable gentlemen appeared before us for what purpose? For the purpose of convincing the committee that they had erred in their conclusions as to what was in proof. Then the committee again considered these matters, or at least I know a portion of the committee did, and a great majority of seven out of nine adhered to their first conclusion.

Now, how do we approach this great controversy? How do we come here to-night to discuss this with the newspapers of Ohio raving at the members of this committee who dared in this honorable body to express their honest sentiment and judgment? Oh, Mr. President, the chairman says it is not a question of determining the right of this man to his seat, it is the question of determining will the Senate go into an inquiry; will the Senate call for witnesses whose names they have not got? Let them formulate those charges that these people have never yet made, let them throw out a drag-net and bring into this body the testimony that these men hint at and dare not declare.

We are told because there is a great public sentiment in Ohio backed by the united press of one great party to which we belong, that the committee ought to yield its judgment and the Senate to-day is asked not to vote with that discretion, with that calm deliberation which is requisite and proper in such cases, but to vote with reference to public sentiment in Ohio and the ravings of the press.

Mr. President, in a life of some activity cast in scenes that sometimes required nerve, I have never yet failed to do my duty as God has given me to see it. Public opinion in Ohio if it was all one way goes for naught with me; public opinion everywhere goes for naught with me. If my judgment is convinced I will so conduct myself on a great question of this kind that I shall have my own approbation. Though the world shall be against me I shall be satisfied when my conscience vindicates my act. I trust the Senate of the United States can come up to that standard, and I think it can.

Mr. President, what was the duty of the committee? To determine whether there was sufficient ground for inquiry. Otherwise why send the case to the committee? Otherwise why ask our deliberation? It is said committees are the eyes and the ears of legislative bodies. The committee discharged its duty and reported to the Senate. Before its report was signed there was a general rumor and understanding in the country that the report would be made, seven members against an inquiry and two for it.

Then the most unheard of, the most unusual occurrence took place. A judicial body of seven men acted under the sanction of their oaths, seven men who by the partiality of their States had been elevated to the highest legislative body in the world, most of them more than once indorsed by their people as men of character and of reputation, most of them of mature years; and what do we see? A call for a newspaper convention in the State of Ohio to compel these recreant Republicans to forswear themselves, to perjure themselves, in the interest of political success!

Mr. President, I yield to no man living in devotion to Republican principles and to the Republican party; but I would rather it should sink out of sight than be forced to believe there were three members of the body who would thus stultify themselves even to secure political success in Ohio or anywhere else.

Are we wrong in the facts? Was there sufficient before the committee to justify us in this conclusion? Honorable gentlemen, two members of the other House, appeared before this committee; and allow me to say that while they are honorable and high-minded gentlemen they partake something of the temper of Ohio, they partake something of the temper of a people that could call a convention of political newspaper editors for the purpose of overawing members of this body. With those prejudices they came there to do what? To read to us from the testimony that we had already carefully examined, and to assume from their standpoint that we were wrong in our conclusions of fact.

In a few instances they did say that somebody had declared that if this investigation went on there might be further and other testimony adduced. I need not say to men who have spent their lives as the greater portion of the members of the Senate have in the forum of the law, that it was but cumulative if it had been admitted to be proper; it was but adding to that which had already been examined; it was but their deductions in nine cases out of ten from evidence already before the committee, and which the Ohio legislative committee had declared proved nothing at all.

The honorable Senator from Illinois read, to the amusement of the Senate and to the amusement of the galleries, that which when I read it made my face tingle with shame that any respectable man should expect or hope to change my opinion upon a statement that some man who had said he was for Mr. Pendleton had afterward voted for somebody else! That and that alone was the last statement which was made to the committee on which we were asked to reverse ourselves and to come to a different conclusion.

The honorable member, Mr. Little, who has had great experience I am told in matters of this kind, having been attorney-general of his State, came before the committee, and in an argument which has been submitted to the Senate, prepared with care and attention, attempted to convince us, as I said before, from his deductions and from his conclusions that we were wrong.

The honorable chairman of the committee who made the minority report comes here to-day and assumes with an air that as much as says, "I have superior virtue and superior intelligence to the members of this committee who have seen fit to declare that there was nothing justifying the Senate in making this inquiry," and then he appeals to us to know if the purity of this body is not to be maintainad, and he lays down the rule that any respectable body making charges against a sitting member is entitled to be heard.

It is not enough by the law, it is not enough by the precedents of this body, that any man or set of men, however great or however good, should not come here to attack a seat unless they make specific charges, and that they have failed and declined to do. Is it enough to say that the sitting member is guilty of corruption, that his seat was bought by money? In this case we are not compelled to question the honesty or the integrity of the sitting member. The case is shorn of one of the most odious and disagreeable features of cases which have sometimes come to this body. All, without exception, of the witnesses before the Ohio committee, and the speakers before our committee, and everywhere, and the chairman of the committee to-day, have testified that there was no evidence whatever inculpating the sitting member, and that there was no reason to suppose that he was guilty of any conduct unbecoming a Senator of this body.

So we are left to the simple question of law, long since established in this body, that there must be first specific charges, and then they must be of a character to convince the mind of the Senate that the result will be that there will be proof of a sufficient change by improper methods to have altered the result of the election. In dealing with this case I have dealt with it without reference to the question whether bribery in a caucus or bribery in a legislative body were different in law. I have assumed for the purposes of this case, as I think I should upon all occasions, that if there had been bribery in the caucus to an extent to have determined a different result from what would have been otherwise arrived at the sitting member would be liable to lose his seat, not because of his criminality but because the will of the people of that State had not been lawfully and properly expressed, and that is all that is left in this case for the Senate.

We were told by the chairman that somebody somewhere has twenty-one names of men who were bribed, and he tells us to-day that the Senate is not entitled to know who they are for fear the ends of justice will be subverted and destroyed and these men I suppose will make their escape beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States. He tells us that there is ample evidence to indict before a grand jury; that there is ample evidence to commit before a committing magistrate. I deny that. The charge of corruption and bribery is a general charge, and that does not bring the crime within the limits which are required even in criminal cases.

It is not enough to say that there has been murder committed; somebody must have been murdered. It is not enough to say that a robbery has been committed; somebody must have been robbed. It is not enough to say that there has been a theft of somebody's goods; they must be identified, they must be specified as having been stolen. In a contest of this character involving not the rights of the Senator but the rights of his State, the dignity of this body, the dignity and the interests of the whole people of the United States, is it to be destroyed upon the assertion of one man or two, or one hundred, no matter how great, no matter how good, who decline to give us the names of the men who they say have been bribed?

The Ohio Legislature dealt not only with the four men but they dealt with many others. They dealt not only with those named in the resolution but they dealt with others, and they failed to find that any one of them had been bribed; and to-day if we should enter upon an investigation there is not the name of a single witness who could be called before the committee unless it was with the moral certainty that he would come there declaring as he had declared before, that there had been neither bribery nor corruption within his knowledge at least.

Mr. President, I am anxious not to detain the Senate at this late hour, but I wish to go over a little of this evidence, and I will venture to do it. I will only venture to do so because the chairman has done it. From his standpoint and from his proposition of law he need not have done it. He makes the broad assertion that ten members of the other House are sufficient when they say they believe corruption existed to put the sitting member upon inquiry. He states that if the governor—who in this case has not been heard from except as I believe he was a participant in the newspaper convention—so declares, that is sufficient complaint.

If that is sufficient complaint to put the sitting member from Ohio upon inquiry, it is equally so to put on inquiry the three members of this committee who signed the report, for they have alleged against us what they dared not allege and do not allege against the sitting member—newspaper reports sufficient to call the United States Senate to an inquiry of this character, the most monstrous and unsupported assertions ever made I believe on this floor. Contrary to every precedent, contrary to every principle of right, contrary to every common-sense idea, the newspapers of Ohio, because they clamor against the sitting member or against other members, can call their seats in question!

The honorable Senator felt undoubtedly that his position was weak; he was not willing to trust that to the Senate in view of the precedents which have been read here to-day. Therefore he resorted to reading what had been in proof, as he says, before the committee in Ohio, and he attempted to make the statement of counsel for the Republican central committee who appeared before our committee evidence in this case, and he assumed it because it said that some man would prove or it was believed some man would prove a certain set of facts; therefore the Senate is bound to order this inquiry at once!

I said I would attempt to approach this case in as calm and dispassionate manner as possible. I endeavored to do so. The momentous occasion, the importance of this verdict of the Senate as a precedent is, in my judgment, sufficient to justify me in taking a little more time than I otherwise would. The minority of the committee have summed up the reasons why the Senate of the United States should proceed to this inquiry. The honorable chairman here to-day said that it was necessary for the dignity of Ohio. I said in response to him, not for the RECORD, that the State of Ohio had not come here, and I repeat again the State of Ohio is not here. It came here with a resolution, but it based its resolution, both branches of that body based their resolutions upon this testimony, industriously, carefully confining their charges to what here appears, and what our committee with unanimity had declared did not make a case. If the State of Ohio had by her resolution of either body said, "We charge that there is fraud and corruption," and had made it specific, there would have been sufficient, in my judgment, to order an inquiry; but the mere, bare charge that there was fraud and corruption is not enough, and this Senate has so declared on more occasions than one when the Legislature itself or members thereof were the complaining party.

It is admitted that the Legislature of a State has nothing to do with the seat of a sitting member in this body. When he has been elected and certified to this body the Constitution has wisely taken away from the State the power to put in jeopardy his seat; and there never was a better illustration of the wisdom of the founders of this Government when they took away from the States the right to call in question the title of a sitting member than this case presents. Do you believe, sitting in the State of Ohio, a Republican senate and house would be able to do justice to the sitting member? With the temper displayed in that State by the public press, if they are to be believed, does anybody suppose they are in a frame of mind to proceed to a judicial inquiry and to determine it in accordance with law, fact, and justice? No; the Constitution wisely said when you have sent your agent here he shall not be put in terror by any act of yours.

The State of Ohio can come here only as its citizens may come. The difference between a resolution of the Ohio house of representatives and that of a mass meeting is simply in the respectability and the character of the men and nothing more. But they with care and attention and industry said, "We make this charge based upon the evidence in this case." One of the branches said, "Whereas it is a precedent in the United States Senate that charges must be directly made, therefore we make the charge based upon this evidence that there may be an investigation." The Republican central committee said the same thing, and in law they stand here just as the house stands and just as the senate stands by their resolution, entitled to the same consideration, no more and no less.

So the State of Ohio is not here, and if she were here we must apply the same rules that are applied to other cases. Specific charges must be made showing us how and when and where this corruption took place so that we may properly enter upon the investigation.

Mr. President, it is suggested that I had better quit and ask a recess, but I prefer to close.

Several SENATORS. Not to-night, but in the morning.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senate proposes to adjourn, I would as lief adjourn now as at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand there is a general feeling among Senators not to hold a night session to-night. I move that the Senate adjourn, the Senator from Colorado retaining the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 21, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 21, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK, of Washington.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ALLEGED FRAUDS ON THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House, giving the reasons why a clerk was not detailed to investigate a settlement made by R. D. Lancaster, and transmitting papers connected therewith; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

OLEOMARGARINE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8328) defining butter; also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and stated that they would be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that, being a revenue bill, it ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rule the bill would go to the Committee on Ways and Means, but the House by a vote referred it originally to the Committee on Agriculture. The gentleman has a right, however, to make a motion on the subject, if he desires. It is not for the Chair to decide absolutely and finally where the bill shall go.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

POLICE REGULATIONS FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an act (S. 2600) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to make police regulations for the government of said District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHANGE OF INDIAN SCHOOL BUILDING, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2855) to authorize a change of location of a certain Indian school building in Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 19, 1886.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to furnish the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, an engrossed copy of the bill, Senate bill 1042, to pay B. S. James for transporting the United States mails.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that since this request was made by the House the original engrossed bill received from the Senate has been found, has been reported back to the House, and is now on the Calendar; so if there be no objection this copy will lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. T. J. CAMPBELL and Mr. CRAIN for the remainder of the week.

MOSES WILLIAMS.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9928) granting a pension to Moses Williams; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CAUSES OF YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 1730, with the amendments thereto, and that it be put upon its passage. It is the bill providing for a commission to investigate into the alleged discovery of the specific causes of yellow fever and the best methods of prevention. I will add that the amendments have secured the support of gentlemen who previously opposed the bill, and I think there is now no opposition to it. The amendments eliminate the provision for paying the commission, and provide for a commission of two persons now in the service of the Government, who shall receive no additional compensation. The amendments also reduce the appropriation from $25,000 to $10,000. I sincerely trust that there will be no further opposition to the passage of the bill.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the privileged resolution which I reported yesterday in relation to final adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] is before the House, unless the regular order is called for.

Mr. VAN EATON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that the resolution which I have called up be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 19, 1886.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at 3 o'clock p. m. July 28, 1886.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to allow the House some opportunity for an expression of views on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered, there will be thirty minutes for debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Several MEMBERS. That is enough.

Mr. MORRISON. I call the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I feel as anxious as any one does to have our labors here closed; but I fear if we adopt this resolution to adjourn one week from to-day, and the resolution should be concurred in by the Senate, we shall fail to perform a very important part of our duty to the public. There are two bills at least (and I think it right I should mention them) which it seems to me of very great moment we should act upon. These bills have been matured in committees, and no great length of time will be required to act upon them. One is the bill to regulate interstate commerce. That bill has been discussed frequently before this House in former Congresses and before the country; I do not suppose it will require a great deal of general discussion. The subject has been acted upon by the Senate, and a Senate bill in relation to it is before us and in condition to be acted on here. For twelve or fifteen years the country has been demanding in every form in which public opinion could be expressed legislation on this subject. The Senate having acted upon the question, if the disposition of the matter by the House should require a few days' delay, it seems to me proper we should consent to this delay; for it is due to the interests of the country that we act upon the subject.

I would also favor a delay of final adjournment for a few days longer than proposed, in order that the Northern Pacific land-grant forfeiture bill may be taken up and acted upon. I think it due to the public that these two measures should be disposed of before we adjourn; and with this view I would be glad if the gentleman from Illinois would permit an amendment to fix Wednesday, the 4th of August, as the day of final adjournment, which would be a postponement one week beyond the time proposed. If the Senate should find that an adjournment can be reached sooner, the matter could be arranged; or if a later date be necessary, that can be settled by the way of amendment. I very much desire that we should not fix in our resolution an earlier day than the 4th of August, so that time may be allowed for action upon the two measures which I have mentioned, and so as to wind up the business of the session without unnecessary haste.

I yield a minute or two to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I concur heartily in the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. I do not think we are now prepared to determine intelligently when this Congress can adjourn. Here are the land-forfeiture bills and the interstate-commerce bill; and in line with the land-forfeiture bills is the Oklahoma bill, not second in importance to any one of the land-forfeiture bills. It will take some time, though not a great deal, to pass upon these questions. There would be time within the period now fixed by the resolution, if the House would get right down to business. But I fear that if the date named be fixed, it will be a signal to those who are opposed to these measures to consume time in order to prevent their passage. As the resolution now stands I shall have to vote against it. I would much prefer that it be amended in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I very much hope that the gentleman from Illinois will allow the House to vote upon a proposition to fix the 4th of August as the day of final adjournment. I perfectly well understand and appreciate the anxiety of many members to get to their homes pending their preliminary campaign; but gentlemen must remember that if this session of Congress should adjourn without having a vote upon three or four or five measures of great importance to the country public expectation will be greatly disappointed. If there is one sentiment stronger in the public mind than another at the present time it is the sentiment in favor of the forfeiture of unearned land grants. Public opinion is impatient at the delay which has already occurred in acting upon these measures; and gentlemen who may be instrumental in adjourning this session of Congress without a vote upon all those bills will hear from the people; and they will be less anxious to hear from the people on that point than they are to hear from them just now on another.

The river and harbor bill at the shortest session of the Forty-eighth Congress failed to pass; and some hundreds of thousands of dollars have been wasted by the total cessation of works of improvement on rivers and harbors and by the failure of the means necessary to protect the works in progress.

Again, if this Congress should adjourn without considering the bill to increase the efficiency of the Navy by inaugurating the building of additional naval vessels public expectation will be very much disappointed. There is also the interstate-commerce bill, which stands second to none of these measures, but first in importance among them. It has not had a day in this House during this session of Congress. The House is ready to vote upon it. It is really ready to vote upon all these measures. And there are other measures which the public expects shall be acted upon. The dilatory proceedings inaugurated yesterday in regard to the river and harbor bill admonish us that the gentlemen who oppose that bill do not intend to allow a vote to be taken on it if they can defeat it by dilatory measures or by an early adjournment. If there is anything in the threat intimated to us yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who seems to be in the confidence of the President, or intimates that he is ——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I never spoke to the President in my life.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman warned us yesterday that he was informed that this bill could not become a law, even if passed by Congress. That declaration could have but one meaning—that he was informed the President would veto it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have seen that in the newspapers repeatedly, in the newspapers of the gentleman's own party; and that is all I know about it.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman from Indiana stands too high before this country to add his high authority to mere newspaper garbage. He can not afford to do that on this floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Well, I refer to the administration organ in this city—the Post.

Mr. DUNN. Well, the gentleman from Indiana can not afford to go before the country upon that assurance. You must have had some greater reason or better assurance than mere newspaper mention. I say, sir, that we should have a vote upon each one of these bills, and we want time to do it.

Mr. ROWELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the President has gone to the Republicans for his counsel?

Mr. DUNN. And we can not agree to anything that will not permit a full opportunity to discuss and vote upon that bill, as well as all of these other matters to which reference has been made.

Mr. REAGAN. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the only question embodied in this resolution is whether we shall pass the river and harbor bill or other necessary legislation before adjournment or not. When the committee saw fit to dump in all the appropriation bills at the end of the session, although I think they had but four——

Mr. DUNHAM. Six.

Mr. RYAN. They had six bills.

Mr. BAYNE. Although they had but six bills to consider and report on, and thereby gave the Senate but a very short time to consider them, so short indeed that the Senate has to sit up now at nights to give them consideration, it is but fair to the interests of this country that we should take a little more time now in order to perfect necessary legislation which has been prepared by the committees.

The river and harbor bill I regard as one that is absolutely essential to the best interests of this country. It will undoubtedly be a great mistake on the part of Congress to adjourn without passing such a bill. If any gentleman will take the trouble to examine the reports of the engineers of the United States Army and read them with any degree of care and see what the urgent necessities of the commerce of the country demand, he will not hesitate I think to support the river and harbor bill, which makes a judicious appropriation for the improvement of the navigable water ways of the country. There is a clamor raised against the bill; the press of the country has to some extent denounced it.

All sorts of wild and illy-considered diatribes are hurled against it; but notwithstanding all that, I believe the navigation interests of this country, with the great commerce depending upon them, are deserving of the careful consideration of Congress, and that Congress should not adjourn until it makes an appropriation to meet the requirements of that commerce. The introduction of this resolution at this time is to shut off this appropriation. The river and harbor bill seems to meet with embarrassment in many parts of the country. The inland districts and sections not bordering upon streams or navigable waters are adverse to the improvement of our water ways because they have no special interest in them. They have a general interest, however; the people of the whole country have a general interest in them; and I think, therefore, it is the duty of Congress to sit here until the necessary legislation is perfected; and I want to see that courage exhibited upon the part of members of this House which will induce them to stay here and vote for or against these great measures, and let them go to their constituents to meet their approval or disapproval upon these vital questions as the case may be.

Mr. REAGAN. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the House before voting upon this resolution reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, for adjournment on the 28th instant, of some of the more important bills which are now pending in the House and waiting its consideration. There is, for instance, the anti-polygamy bill. There is the interstate-commerce bill, the general bankruptcy bill, the international copyright bill, the land-grant forfeiture bills, the pension bill passed by the Senate, the Oklahoma bill, the bill admitting Dakota, the tariff bill, the bill creating the Agricultural Department, the free-ship bill, and many other important measures which are now upon our Calendars. Certainly there can be no excuse for adjournment until some if not all of these important measures are considered, especially those relating to interstate commerce and the pension laws of the country. We have an opportunity now to accomplish that legislation which the country desires. The Senate has passed the Cullom bill—a bill of judicious character with reference to interstate commerce, and which I believe meets the approval of a large majority of the House. We can have legislation upon that important subject without doubt at this session if we are not too hurried about this matter of adjournment.

I know gentlemen say it is now late. I do not so understand it. There is no one member of this body who is employed by his constituents or the country for any shorter period of time than the whole year. The time for the adjournment of this House, if it be necessary that it should remain in session that length of time, is the first Monday in December next. That is the time these gentlemen are paid to serve their constituents. They are not paid for the purpose of hurrying off home to enter into a political campaign. There is no excuse for abandoning the public business. I desire the interstate-commerce bills to be considered. I want the Cullom bill to be passed. I want an opportunity to vote for it and to urge its passage upon others. It is not all that I would have it, but in the main it is a wise, judicious measure. As it will come before the House it will be cumbered with the bill known as the Reagan bill. If we can get rid of this by a vote, the question will then recur upon the Cullom bill, which I hope will be passed.

Mr. REAGAN. I now yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope this adjournment resolution will be postponed at least for a few days. What, sir, is the present condition of legislation in Congress? Three great appropriation bills of this House—the sundry civil bill, the deficiency bill, and the fortifications bill—have not yet come out of the committee in the Senate.

Mr. RYAN. Oh, yes; the gentleman is mistaken about that. The sundry civil bill is about finished.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The Senate sat nearly all last night finishing it.

Mr. DUNHAM. And the deficiency bill has been reported.

Mr. WILLIS. The deficiency bill has not yet been reported.

Mr. DUNHAM. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it has been reported.

Mr. WILLIS. And the naval bill is in conference, while the river and harbor bill has not yet gone to conference.

Mr. RANDALL. But the deficiency bill has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, that does not change very much the situation. The important bills are yet to be acted upon. The surplus resolution to which we attached so much importance is not yet out of the committee.

Now, what do we propose to do? If we pass this resolution we place it in the hands, not of a minority, even, but only of forty members on this floor to defeat every one of these great and important bills. The sundry civil bill has between two and three hundred amendments. When it comes to the bar of the House it can be challenged upon each one of these amendments. Each one can, if it be necessary to consume time, be considered in Committee of the Whole, and the whole time of the session between now and the 28th of this month can be and will be consumed upon the sundry civil bill alone. The naval bill, the surplus resolution, the reconstruction of the Navy, the interstate-commerce bill, all of these great and important measures will fall to the ground.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, if it be permissible to refer to what is going on at the other end of the Capitol, I may say we have reason to suppose the House is in advance of the Senate in the matter of legislation, and especially in legislation which must be done before any adjournment can be had; it is therefore altogether probable that this resolution, if adopted, will amount to nothing more than information to the Senate that the House can be ready to adjourn at the time named. The measures of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has spoken, the surplus resolution and the other matters to which he has referred, are in charge of the body at the other end of the Capitol, and, from what I have observed, I deem it safe to predict that the surplus resolution will not occupy much of the time of that body. Perhaps I ought not to say this, but I say it because I think I know it. In regard to the measures to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has referred, I am in sympathy with him in desiring consideration of the interstate-commerce bill and of the bills forfeiting unearned land grants; and if gentlemen will cease talking and go to work these measures can and will be considered. [Applause and cries of "Hear!" "Hear!" and "That is right!"] Several months ago orders were passed enabling the Committee on Public Lands to enter upon the consideration of these bills of forfeiture, and now after the lapse of many months they are still unconsidered.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. They would not consider them if we staid here all summer.

Mr. MORRISON. So it is with the interstate-commerce bill. Four or five months, or at least months, ago the committee having that bill in charge was given the right of way to call it up on the morning of any day.

Mr. DUNN. But that right of way was taken away from the committee repeatedly by vote of the House.

Mr. HENLEY. And the same is true of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly; and if the House desires to take away that right to-day, or to-morrow, or the next day, it will do so; and, on the other hand, if the House desires to consider the measure, it can consider it to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will permit me to say a word in reply to his statement about the interstate-commerce bill. Before we could get our bill through the House the Senate passed a bill on the same subject, and we felt that it was useless to consider our bill until we could get the Senate bill before us, and from that time to this the gentleman himself and others have occupied the time of the House with appropriation bills and other measures that have precedence over the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I am not complaining of the committee or of the gentleman at all. I am only assuring him that I am in sympathy with him in his desire to pass that bill, and if the House inclines the same way he can consider his bill to-day or any day before adjournment.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, in justice to the Committee on Public Lands I desire to say that there has not been an hour of this session when the Committee on Public Lands have not been trying to have these land-forfeiture bills considered.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If they have had so little success in the past, what do they hope for in the future? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENLEY. The want of success has been owing in part to opposition coming from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, as to the river and harbor bill, I need hardly say that that bill is quite as well able to take care of itself as it ought to be [laughter], and its friends need have no cause for alarm. I will not detain the House longer.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman whether he will consent to have the House vote upon an amendment to this resolution?

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move to recommit the resolution with instructions.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words before the vote is taken.

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who is a member of the committee reporting the resolution.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRISON. All the gentleman wants, if I have so much.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman [Mr. MORRISON] has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it would not be at all difficult to make some piquant comments on the present situation of affairs, but I do not intend to indulge myself in anything of that sort. I suppose that the whole House recognizes the actual situation. The summer is past, the harvest is about ended, and whether anybody is saved or not can not be determined by discussions here or prophetic utterances.

We have been in session about eight months. Every gentleman connected with the measures that have been spoken of this morning has of course done his whole duty, has been instant in season and out of season, but the result has been that we have failed of accomplishment to any very great extent, and if we should stay here any longer it seems to me that we should probably have about the same result with more expenditure of time.

I simply want to call the House to witness that the majority have met with no factious opposition, no waste of time, no spinning out of debates, no hampering. They have had the rules changed to suit themselves; they have had most abundant opportunity for the transaction of business. My friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] has had his burdens lightened to such an extent that he might have set us an example of speedy action upon the appropriation bills that were left to him. [Laughter.] The other committees on appropriations have had ample time and opportunity to consider their business with fullness and amplitude of detail. I want simply to point out the charming Arcadian simplicity of the situation which the gentlemen on the other side have had to deal with this session, a perfectly uninterrupted flow, perfect opportunity for the display of their varied talents, perfect opportunity to pass every measure which they deemed consistent with the honor, the dignity, the glory of the country; and it is to the credit of the gentlemen who have spoken this morning that, after all the Democratic party have achieved this session, they still find other fields of achievement open and possible for them.

It shows that there are men in the Democratic party who are in advance of the great mass of "reform" gentlemen who intended to make this country blossom like the rose, but who do not seem thus far to have absolutely succeeded. [Laughter.]

It does seem to me about time we should make some attempt toward finding the end of this session. It would seem that the country at least, if one can judge by the expressions of public opinion, is satisfied we have had full trial of our opportunities and capabilities. If these measures which are spoken of have not been brought up, who is to be blamed? After eight months of this session of Congress have passed, can we do anything better than make an attempt toward adjournment? The other branch of Congress, if it should find that the public business requires a modification of the resolution, will make such modification, and then the resolution will come back to us to be considered in the light of all the circumstances of the case. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MORRISON. As the gentleman from Maine has now relieved himself of what he wanted to say, I demand a vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], as the Chair understood, moved to recommit.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. With instructions to report a resolution fixing the 4th day of August for final adjournment.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, to recommit, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 39, noes 152.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, it was adopted; there being—ayes 145, noes 36.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to recommit be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to call up the resolution reported by me yesterday, fixing a day for the consideration of House bill No. 6664.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 22d day of July, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for consideration of House bill 6664, entitled "A bill to increase the naval establishment;" and if the consideration of said bill shall not be completed on that day, then Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, is hereby set apart for the further consideration of the said bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will not adopt this resolution. The gentleman from Illinois has just secured the passage of a resolution fixing a day for final adjournment, and now he proposes to select the bills which shall occupy the time between now and the adjournment. I am in favor of the naval bill all the time, but I would prefer to act on a bill upon which action is much more generally demanded by the country. I trust the House at this stage of the session will not take a course which may preclude the possibility of considering the interstate-commerce bill, which certainly, so far as the public sentiment and the wish of the country are concerned, stands pre-eminently above any other measure now before the House. I hope this resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON. Before moving the previous question I desire to say a word. I have been directed by the Committee on Rules to report this resolution and to urge its adoption. If adopted it will put the Committee on Naval Affairs as to the consideration of this bill for the increase of the naval establishment exactly where the Committee on Commerce is in relation to the question of interstate commerce, and where the Committee on Public Lands is in relation to the question of land forfeitures. It will put it in the power of the House to consider whichever of these measures it desires to consider, to-morrow or on any other day. When this bill comes up any gentleman can raise the question of consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to know from the Speaker, if he feels free to express an opinion, whether the gentleman from Illinois has properly interpreted the effect of this resolution. The gentleman assumes that the resolution would simply place the Naval Committee, with reference to this bill, in the same position in which the Committee on Commerce stands with relation to the interstate-commerce bill, and in which other committees stand in regard to bills for the consideration of which a day has been fixed. Heretofore in several instances where days have been set for the consideration of particular measures it has been held that all other special orders were excluded.

I think it right the House should now know whether we are to be entrapped into the same state of affairs in the closing days of this session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this resolution will set apart—in other words dedicate—the two days named in it for the consideration of the bill for the increase of the naval establishment; and it would exclude all other business on those days.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It would exclude the land-forfeiture bills, would it not?

Mr. MORRISON. In this same way days have been fixed for the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill and public-land measures; and the question of consideration has been frequently raised, and those measures have been set aside for the day or sometimes postponed for a longer time. As I understand, the same thing may be done under this resolution. Mr. Speaker, is not that true?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House can never put it out of its power to decide at the time when any particular measure comes up whether it will consider it or not; that is to say, any gentleman, under the rules, has the right to raise the question of consideration.

A MEMBER. And does a majority decide that?

The SPEAKER. A majority decides.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to ask a parliamentary inquiry. Does this resolution "fix" these days or "set apart" these days?

The SPEAKER. It sets them apart.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood the Chair to say that the resolution would give this business the exclusive right to those days.

The SPEAKER. In the same way, Friday of each week is set apart for the consideration of private business; yet, although the House may not vote to dispense with private business, each bill as it comes up is subject to the question of consideration. When the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] under this order calls up his bill to-morrow morning or Saturday morning any gentleman under the rules of the House, which this resolution does not change, will have the right to raise the question of consideration against it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In favor of any other bill?

The SPEAKER. Not in faver of any other bill. Any gentleman can raise the question of consideration, and then if the House determines not to consider this bill it will go on with the other business of the House.

Mr. BUCK. That to be determined by the majority vote?

The SPEAKER. Yes, that to be determined by the majority vote. It is a right which can not be taken away from members. It is provided for in the rules of the House.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order to move to recommit this?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move to recommit with the following instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the order heretofore adopted requiring the House to adjourn at 5 o'clock p. m. be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. MORRISON. No. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. If I can get unanimous consent to refer that to the Committee on Rules I will withdraw the motion to recommit. I think that order should be rescinded, because we can not do anything under it.

Mr. SPRINGER'S motion to recommit was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 41.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No quorum has voted. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. PAYSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 192, nays 47, not voting 83, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last night the tellers were about to take their places on a vote on this amendment. That vote will now be taken anew.

Mr. HEWITT. Before that I desire to make a brief statement.

I am satisfied, after a conference with the members of the committee in charge of this bill, that the object I have in view will be accomplished by voting non-concurrence in the amendments generally. The committee have now had their attention attracted to the matter, and I am sure when the conference is ordered it will act in accordance with the views practically indorsed by the House; and if we can have a vote upon that amendment as upon the others I shall ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, so the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. HEWITT. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is understood we shall have a vote upon that if demanded in the House?

Mr. WILLIS. That is understood.

I now renew my motion to non-concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. To what extent, let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky, do you grant a vote in the House on disagreement to these amendments? On what portion or what portions of the amendment is a separate vote to be permitted? On any amendment on which a gentleman may demand a separate vote?

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir; because we would be here four months in that event. There are four or five amendments, as I stated yesterday, which the Senate have incorporated upon the bill that are of an important character. These are matters that will be brought up in the House and a separate vote permitted upon them.

I now renew my motion to non-concur.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I now move that the committee rise and report non-concurrence in the Senate amendment, and consent to the conference asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the river and harbor appropriation bill, with Senate amendment thereto, had directed him to report the same to the House with recommendation that it be non-concurred in, and consent given to the request for a conference.

Mr. WILLIS. On that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the report of the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the last vote taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as managers at said conference on the part of the House Mr. WILLIS, Mr. BLANCHARD, and Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENLEY addressed the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move to take up the Senate bill to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. HENLEY. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas calls up a special order.

Mr. HENLEY. But I wish to make a privileged report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, who was recognized, calls up a special order of the House, which is also privileged, and of as high a privilege as the other; in fact higher, because it is made a special order by the House.

Mr. HENLEY. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to do that.

Mr. HENLEY. I do so because I wish to reach the consideration of the Northern Pacific land-grant forfeiture bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California raises the question of consideration as against this bill. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider it?

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Speaker state the exact question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California states that he desires to make a privileged report from the Committee on the Public Lands to forfeit the unearned lands granted the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and for that purpose raises the question of consideration against the interstate-commerce bill called up by the gentleman from Texas.

The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the interstate-commerce bill?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 94, noes 66.

Mr. HENLEY. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 99, not voting 81; as follows:

So the House determined to consider the bill.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I was just passing into the hall as my name was called, but I had not quite reached the floor.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman inside of the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I was not. If I can be permitted to vote I wish to be recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the gentleman's name can not be recorded.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, with Mr. SYMES, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. LITTLE, on this vote. Mr. LITTLE would vote ay if Mr. GIBSON were present.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House determines to proceed with the consideration of the bill to regulate commerce. The Chair thinks the Senate bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. The bill, as the Chair will see by referring to the order, is in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair will remember that there was an agreement that the Senate bill was to be put under the special order which had been made in reference to the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the RECORD.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, when the House bill was made a special order for the 13th day of May it was put into the House as in Committee of the Whole. In the House bill there is no appropriation of money provided for. In the Senate bill there is an appropriation of money provided for, and of course, under the rules of this House, that bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. That is so, Mr. Speaker, unless there was unanimous consent to put the Senate bill under the same order as the House bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But, Mr. Speaker, there was nothing like unanimous consent. The Senate bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with the House bill as an amendment. The Senate bill, however, requires an appropriation of money to pay the salaries of the commissioners, and that brings it into Committee of the Whole. I have no objection to having the bill considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, but I do not want to put it in such a position as that debate will be limited upon this important question, a question which requires the fullest debate, the Senate having taken three weeks to discuss it.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, yes, and you have had three years.

The SPEAKER. When the House bill was made a special order the Senate bill had not then been passed or reported to the House, and the House bill not making any appropriation or requiring any appropriation to be made, was on the House Calendar. The order was then made that it should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Afterward, when the Senate bill was reported to the House, the terms of the first order were made, by express provision, to apply to the Senate bill as well; which the Chair thinks results in having the Senate bill also considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think I raised a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did, but he afterward withdrew it. The Chair will cause to be read what occurred in reference to the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1532, to regulate interstate commerce, now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having been reported back from the Committee on Commerce, be considered also under the special order when the House bill to regulate interstate commerce shall be called up.

Mr. SPRINGER. The request of the gentleman is that the Senate bill be also included in that order?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNHAM. What is that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. DUNHAM. But it is not upon the same Calendar.

The SPEAKER. No; because the Senate bill proposes a commission, and is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but the fact that they are on different Calendars makes no difference.

Mr. DUNHAM. We have not both of those bills here, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. They are here.

Mr. DUNHAM. I shall have to object for the present at least.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois supposed the Senate bill was not on the Calendar. I have explained to him the situation, and that the object was to consider it with the House bill, to which I understand he is willing to withdraw his objection.

Mr. DUNHAM. I shall withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Without further objection, the order requested by the gentleman from Texas will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. And the Journal of the same day shows that the Senate bill was to be considered under the special order of the House of March 16 ultimo, which was an order providing that it should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the House comprehends from the statements in the RECORD and the Journal the position in which the question now stands. The House committee reported a bill; subsequently the Senate passed a bill, which was referred to the House Committee on Commerce, and that committee, acting upon the Senate bill, reported it back with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the provisions of the House bill. What I wish to attempt now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment? There are several gentlemen absent from the House and from the city to-day who have heretofore expressed a desire to speak upon this bill. I propose, therefore, that leave be given both for gentlemen who are not present, and for any others who desire it, to print remarks upon this subject in the RECORD.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I promised certain gentlemen to ask unanimous consent that they might have leave to print remarks on this bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. There is nothing before the House. I demand the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the reading of the bill, which he has a right to do.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman does not understand the bill, let it be read.

Mr. DUNHAM. I demand the reading of both bills.

The SPEAKER. Only one bill is under consideration, which is the Senate bill with the amendment, in the form of a substitute, proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill and the proposed substitute.

Mr. REAGAN (before the reading was concluded) said: I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he will not consent to have the reading of the bill dispensed with?

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to accommodate the gentleman from Texas, but I do no see how the House can properly understand the bill, and be prepared to vote upon it, without having it read.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is aware that nobody is listening to the reading, and we are simply consuming time uselessly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] insists on his objection to dispensing with the reading.

Mr. DUNHAM. I thing the gentleman from Texas ought not to charge that members of the House are not paying attention to their duties.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill and the proposed substitute.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask consent of the House to fix a time for the closing of general debate. In order to ascertain the views of the House, I suggest that by general consent the session of to-day be extended until 6 o'clock and that general debate on this bill be closed at that time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Texas will postpone any effort to fix now a time for closing debate. There are many absentees to-day——

Mr. REAGAN. I think it my duty under the circumstances to have a time fixed, if possible, for the closing of general debate. If I can get unanimous consent I shall be glad; if I can not——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas submits, as the Chair understands, two propositions. One is to extend the session of the House till 6 o'clock this evening; the other is to close general debate on the pending bill at that time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Texas will withhold the proposition to close debate until a later hour to-day.

Mr. REAGAN. If the proposition I have already suggested be not acceptable, I would suggest as an alternative proposition that the House take a recess from 5 o'clock this evening until 8 o'clock, the evening session to terminate at 11 o'clock, and general debate to be closed at that time. My object is that we close general debate to-day.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope that suggestion will be concurred in.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The objection to that proposition is that it is utterly impossible to get a large number of members here at night to listen to a debate; and this is too practical a subject to be discussed to empty seats. I do not wish to delay the final action of the House upon this bill; but I do protest that this is not a proper time to fix a limit to the debate; and I hope the House will not compel us to come here at a night session to speak upon so important and practical a a subject to vacant seats.

Mr. STRUBLE. The seats are practically vacant now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Not as they will be to-night.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing this interstate commerce question for the last ten years.

Several MEMBERS. That is true.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It seems to me gentlemen here generally are in a condition to vote on this question; and we can expedite the consideration of this measure very much by having no general debate at all.

Many MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That suits me.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If we intend business, let us get at it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I second the gentleman's proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess at 5 o'clock this afternoon until 8 o'clock, the evening session to continue until 11 o'clock, and to be for general debate only. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to having the whole day and evening devoted to general debate on this bill. Everybody understands it, and we ought to have action on it promptly.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Texas can not get unanimous consent for anything in connection with this bill. Whatever rights he has in this matter, I hope he will assert them, without asking unanimous consent.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to assert the rights of the Committee on Commerce. There are fifteen members of that committee; and it was the understanding in the committee that most of the members should be heard on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DUNHAM. I object until I know what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. What is his proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proposes that at 5 o'clock the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock, and continue in session from 8 until 11 o'clock for general debate only.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman from Texas will close debate altogether and let us vote on the bill. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. REAGAN. Is there any objection to the proposition?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection having been made, the gentleman from Texas is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it was not my wish to close this discussion without permitting gentlemen to be heard on both sides. There are two bills before the House, and perhaps there should be some explanation as to the character of those measures. [Cries of "Vote!"] But if it be the wish of the House to vote now on these two propositions, of course I will not stand in the way of that being done. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let us vote now; it will not take ten minutes to settle the question.

Mr. REAGAN. I will act in obedience to what seems to be the general request of members. Before doing so, however, I will ask by unanimous consent that members generally may have leave to print remarks on this question.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. I will take the sense of the House to close debate and vote on the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is what we want.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is so much confusion in the Hall that the Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from Texas. The public business will be suspended until we have order on the floor.

Several MEMBERS. Call for the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the House substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. DUNHAM rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is not debatable.

Mr. REED, of Maine. This bill has to be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We are in the House and not in the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under an order of the House.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Even in that case it has to be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. We can not have business of this kind stampeded simply because those having it in charge have not attended to it during the eight months of the session. Let us undertake to act in some sensible way. If everybody does as the gentleman from California seems to understand there is no necessity for him indulging in language.

Mr. ROWELL. There are two vital questions before us.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is too serious business to be stampeded in this way.

Mr. ROWELL. They differ as vitally as two questions can.

Mr. REAGAN. If gentlemen will consent to extend the session until 6 o'clock so that debate may run on until then I will withdraw my demand.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If the chairman of the committee will permit me to say a word in behalf of the minority of the Committee on Commerce, I will state to the House there was an understanding acquiesced in by the chairman of the committee himself that opportunity should be given to debate this bill whenever it came up. The gentleman knows it, and I do not think it fair for him now to come into the House and ask that we shall proceed to vote without any debate whatever. I grant we may be near the end of the session, but this is an important matter of legislation, and from my standpoint as well as from his I desire faith shall be kept, and we may be permitted to be heard on one side and the other on the vital and important questions involved in this matter.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The House has some rights, too.

Mr. REAGAN. I offered the proposition to extend the session until 6 o'clock, or to take a recess from 5 until 8 and continue until 11 for general debate only.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will not hear me. I ask unanimous consent to extend the session until 6 o'clock this evening, or, if that is not acceptable, to extend the debate until 5 o'clock, and then to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening to continue the general debate until 11 o'clock. If gentlemen will accept either proposition I will renew it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Why, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that there are various members absent——

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, they should be here.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Who are absent on important business and by consent of the House, and who desire to be heard on this bill. One of them I will name, the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND.

Mr. RYAN. Well, the House does not propose to wait for anybody who is absent. If gentlemen are not here it is not the fault of the House.

The SPEAKER (having resumed the chair). What is the proposition of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. REAGAN. I have made an alternative proposition to extend the session of the House this evening until 6 o'clock and close general debate at that time. The other, if this was not accepted, was to take a recess at 5 o'clock, to meet again at 8 o'clock to-night, the general debate to close on this bill at 11 o'clock this evening.

Mr. BRUMM. And no vote to be taken to-day?

Mr. REAGAN. I will submit the latter proposition again to the House—that the general debate be extended to 5 o'clock, at which hour we take a recess, to meet again at 8 o'clock, with the understanding that the general debate is to close at 11 o'clock to-night.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am just informed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that Mr. HAMMOND does not expect to return to the House this session. I did not know that fact when I made the statement a moment ago, because before he went away he expressed to me his desire to discuss this bill in favor of its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Texas. The first is that unanimous consent be given to extend the session of the House to-day until 6 o'clock and that general debate be closed at that hour. Is there objection?

Mr. HENLEY. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Objection has already been made.

The gentleman from Texas now asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess at 5 o'clock to-day until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted exclusively to debate on this bill, which shall close at 11 o'clock to-night.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object to that.

Mr. HENLEY. I will object unless it assumes this modification: that all debate, not only the general debate but debate under the five minute-rule as well, be closed at that time.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object in either event.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HENLEY. I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas now to this fact, that unless he gets his bill through to-day the probabilities are that he will not get it through at all, for to-morrow, under the order of the House made to-day, the naval construction bill comes up. The fate of his bill depends, in my judgment, on action to-day.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that all general debate be closed on this bill at 5 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to amend that by making it 4 o'clock.

Many MEMBERS. Say 3 o'clock.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. The general debate not having been entered upon on this bill it is not in order to move to close it.

Mr. WELLBORN. But there has been general debate.

The SPEAKER. Of course if there has been no general debate the motion would not be in order.

Mr. REAGAN. There has not been much, but I suppose I spoke two or three minutes upon it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think that there has been any.

The SPEAKER. The record will show. The present occupant of the chair supposes that the gentleman from Texas, before the bill was read at all, took the floor and proceeded to state the situation in regard to the bill, that is, when it came to the House and what order had been made in reference to it; but the Chair remembers no general debate.

Mr. WELLBORN. My colleague had actually begun his speech when it was interrupted by the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM], who insisted on the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman was merely stating the situation of the bill.

Mr. WELLBORN. I do not know what progress he had made, but he was actually addressing the House upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair remembers the gentleman had the floor and was proceeding in the manner suggested to explain the situation of the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Why can not the gentleman make his observations now?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The bill had not been read then.

The SPEAKER. The bill had not been read when the gentleman from Texas took the floor, but it was read afterward.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the question before it at this time. The Senate bill which has been read was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The committee reported that bill back with the recommendation to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the provisions of the House bill for it. It is right for me to say in reference to the main features of difference between the two bills that in three different Congresses, with the issue directly made, the House has decided in favor of the provisions of the House bill by large majorities upon a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield to me a few minutes before he gets through.

Mr. REAGAN. In a moment.

It was my belief and hope, sir, that we would be able to take action upon the bill at a much earlier day. After the House bill was in a position to take it up the Senate bill came to the House; and I think it is right I should make this explanation in view of some remarks that have been made. It would then have been idle to take up the House bill without reference to the other. The committee, therefore, as they believed proper, took up the Senate bill referred to them and acted upon it. It was some time after the Senate bill was reported back by the committee and placed upon the Calendar before we got this bill placed by order of the House for consideration along with the House bill.

From the time that order was obtained the House has been occupied continuously with appropriation bills and revenue bills which had precedence, and there has been no time since this bill has been in a condition to be called up when it has been possible to call it up. Gentlemen may rest assured that if there had been any such time it would have been called up, for I have been in my place all the time, intending all the time to call it up whenever it was in order. I feel it due to the committee that I should make this statement, in view of the remarks made here this morning implying that the bill might have been considered at an early day in the session if sufficient vigilance had been exercised.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take any five minutes for general debate upon this bill, because I want the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas, to comply with his agreement, to stand by his vote in the committee and to stand by the committee. I must say I have never seen such an instance as the gentleman presents of——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call the gentleman to order. The gentleman declines to take the time yielded to him by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. Do committees govern general debate in the House, or does that rest with the House?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennnsylvania. I will answer that. The committees always arrange about the debate, and the gentleman ought to know it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that if he declines to accept the time——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not decline to accept the time. I decline it for general debate. I desire to say to this House that they should have a practical exposition of these two bills——

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker. I renew my motion that general debate be closed at 5 o'clock to-day, and upon that I ask the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask my friend from Texas to make it 4 o'clock instead of 5.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] moves that general debate upon this bill close at 5 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to amend by making it 4 o'clock.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion can not be laid on the table. It is not debatable, and it is one of those motions which can not be disposed of in that way. The gentleman from Texas moves that all general debate upon this bill be closed at 5 o'clock p. m. to-day; to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves an amendment, that all general debate upon the bill close at 4 o'clock p. m.; and upon these questions the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that general debate close at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from Illinois means 4 o'clock this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. BURROWS. Why, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] occupies his hour, as he probably will, that will leave but half an hour for other gentlemen.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 42.

Mr. DUNHAM. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. DUNHAM, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSHEND, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 23.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, in order to compromise this matter, I am willing to withdraw my amendment and let the general debate be closed at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine.

Mr. REAGAN. And with that let it be understood that the time is to be equally divided between the friends and the opponents of the measure.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has not the gentleman from Illinois a right to withdraw his motion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] objects to the proposed understanding.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can withdraw his motion.

The SPEAKER. That he has a right to do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then, Mr. Speaker, in deference to the desires of several gentlemen around me, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment being withdrawn, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that general debate close at 5 o'clock.

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 1.

Mr. DUNHAM. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 204, nays 24, not voting 94; as follows:

So the motion to close general debate on the pending bill at 5 o'clock p. m. to-day was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SAYERS] is absent on a conference committee.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. LOVERING with Mr. KELLEY, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. HANBACK, for the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. Some requests for leave of absence which should have been presented to the House this morning were at that time mislaid. If there be no objection the Chair will now lay them before the House, before announcing the result of the vote just taken.

There was no objection; and, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRAGG, for the remainder of the session, on account of important business.

To Mr. WEST, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SENEY, until Monday next.

To Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, indefinitely.

To Mr. BARNES, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. REID, North Carolina, until Monday next.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. REAGAN. There are now two hours and ten minutes remaining under the order of the House for general debate. I suggest that the time be equally divided between the friends and the opponents of the bill; and I suggest that the time in opposition be under the control of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL].

SAINT AUGUSTINE AND LAZARETTO CREEKS, GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Texas proceeds the Chair desires to state that in a bill passed last evening—the bill (H. R. 8967) to authorize the building of railroad bridges across Saint Augustine and Lazaretto Creeks, in the State of Georgia, there was a typographical error. In the bill as passed the language read:

Nothing in this act shall be so constructed as a repeal or modify, &c.

It should read:

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify, &c.

If there be no objection that change will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall limit what I have to say on this question to a statement of the leading differences between the two bills now before the House for consideration.

The Senate bill differs from the House bill in that its provisions relate to the transportation of passengers as well as freights, and transportation by water as well as by land.

The House bill relates only to the transportation of freights and on railroads.

The first section of the House bill should be amended by adding to it lines 24, 25, 26, 27 of the first section of the Senate bill.

The second section of the Senate bill differs from the House bill in providing a measure of damages for its violation, and which is inadequate, by saying that a person charged a higher rate than is charged to any other person may collect the difference between such higher rate and the lowest rate charged upon like shipments during the same period.

This is no improvement on the common-law remedy which may now be invoked for a like purpose. The common law furnishes no practicable remedy for the abuses of power and the unlawful conduct of the managers of railroads. Claimants for small sums as damages can not as a general rule afford the expense of litigation to establish their claims, while the railroad corporations as a rule protract such litigation to such an extent as to wear out the claimants and defeat the ends of justice.

Their power to tax the commerce of the country at will enables them to supply the revenues necessary to employ the ablest legal talent of the country to represent them, and also to meet court costs; for these purposes the citizen must use his private means. This is known as a matter of common observation to all of us, and if we would protect the public against such wrongs we must furnish a better remedy than the common law. This is admitted in the able report of the Senate's committee.

The House bill provides for the recovery of full damages and requires the court in each case of recovery to tax the corporation with a reasonable fee for the plaintiff's counsel or attorney fees. This is an improvement of the common-law remedy in that, in case of recovery, it requires the defendant to pay the plaintiff's reasonable attorney's fees. The remedy should go further and require the payment of double or treble damages, and I think I shall offer an amendment for that purpose. Besides this, the railway corporations have the power by discriminations and unfriendly delays to punish any of their patrons who may attempt by litigation or otherwise to prevent their discriminations and injustice.

Section 4 of the Senate's bill, page 4, contains the provision that "no such common carrier shall be required to give the use of its terminal facilities to any other carrier engaged in like business."

This is a clear attempt at Congressional regulation of the corporate rights and franchises of the railroad corporations, and is not within the powers of the constitutional provisions which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the States. It is a power which clearly belongs to the States as to roads not situated in the Territories and in the District of Columbia. It is also evidently put in the bill to subserve some private purpose and not for the public good. A note to page 82 of Hudson's "Railways and the Republic" shows how the Standard Oil Company got possession of the terminal facilities for handling oil in Philadelphia and Baltimore. And on this subject see also New York investigating committee's report, page 44. This clause may have for its object to invoke the authority of Congress to preserve to it the advantages it then gained. And there may be other like cases. But as the enactment of this clause would be in violation of the Constitution it could afford them no protection in their wrongdoing, and would not avail to establish or perpetuate monopolies.

The fourth section of the Senate bill, the one which deals with the question of the long and short haul, is simply meaningless. To the casual reader it would seem as if it meant to prohibit charging more for the carriage of a like amount and kind of freight for a shorter than for a longer distance, but it does not do this. Its language is:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of freight and passengers or of like kind of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction and from the same original point of departure or to the same point of arrival.

It does not define or designate the original point of departure. Where is the original point of departure on any railroad? Is not every depot from which freight is sent an original point of departure for that freight? This section can only mean that one person can not be charged more than another for a like amount and kind of service, and is but a reenactment of other provisions of the bill. It does not prohibit charging more for a short than for a long haul.

The fourth section of the House bill is plain and specific on this subject. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter distance, on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or ease by such corporation.

But if this part of the Senate's bill had been allowed to have that effect, the closing part of the section would have substantially nullified it, as it provides that the commission which the bill creates may exempt the railroad companies from its operation. And this section also provides that when such exemptions are made by the commission, until changed by the commission or by law they shall have the same force and effect as though they had been specified in the section. This is an attempt to delegate the authority of Congress to the railroad commission to make law. I do not understand that the power to legislate can be so delegated.

The object of this important provision is to protect the people at non-competitive points from paying for the carriage of the freight shipped from competitive points. It was found difficult to provide a rule which would be entirely equitable. It would not be right to charge the same rate per mile for a long as for a short distance; as the loading, unloading, preparation of trains, and handling would be the same in both cases. In adopting the provision that no more shall be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter, we did discriminate in favor of the long haul to the extent of providing that no more should be charged for the shorter than for the longer distance, thus leaving the provision so that if the transportation companies find it necessary they may charge as much for the short as for the long haul. This rule recognizes the territorial extent of the country and the character of shipments to be made.

It enables the transportation companies to carry grain and flour and meats from the productive fields of the West as cheaply as from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, or from the western parts of Pennsylvania or New York to the seaboard.

Justice and fair dealing could surely require no more. And in preventing charging more for the short than for the long haul it conforms to the rule adopted in the State constitutions of Pennsylvania, Missouri, Arkansas, and California and by the statute laws of Massachusetts and other States.

Besides the injustice and the ruinous consequences to shippers of charging more for a short than for a long haul, the power to do so enables the transportation companies to control the manufacturing interests of the country and to drive them from non-competitive points and from the rural parts of the country, where living is cheaper and health better, to the great commercial centers, where there is competition in freight rates. This is a power which no government of a free people would dare to exercise, and which no wisely administered government would think of exercising, and yet the railroad companies demand and insist on the right to exercise this vast and dangerous power. And under it they are impoverishing some cities, towns, and communities, without any fault of theirs, and enriching others having no other merit to this favor than the arbitrary power of the transportation companies.

Section 5 of the House bill requires that those engaged in carrying property, as provided in the first section of the bill, shall adopt and keep posted up schedules on their respective roads, as described in section 4, which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which it shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, and handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part is for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

This last provision is necessary in order to prevent excessive charges for transportation under the name of terminal facilities. It also provides for changes of schedules, and that they shall be printed and posted up for public inspection at least five days before they are to go into effect. It also provides that after thirty days from the passage of the act it shall be unlawful to charge more or less than shall be specified in these schedules.

A new provision was added to this section by the committee which provides that any railroad receiving freight for shipment in the United States to be carried through a foreign country to some other point in the United States, the company receiving such freight shall keep posted in a conspicious place at the depot where such freight is received for shipment a schedule giving the through rates to all points of the United States beyond the foreign territory, or be subject to the penalties prescribed in the bill. And any freight shipped through foreign territory and reshipped into the United States without a compliance with this provision will be subject to customs duties, as if of foreign production.

This provision was inserted to prevent the unfair competition of the roads through Canadian territory.

Section 5 of the Senate's bill does not require the accounts of the common carriers to show what part of their charges is for transportation and what part is for terminal facilities, and is in this respect defective and would fail to protect shippers against improper charges in many cases. It also only requires the schedule rates to be made public so far as may in the judgment of the commission be deemed practicable, and that said commission shall from time to time prescribe the measure of publicity which shall be given. This is a serious defect in this bill. What just reason can be offered why the rates of transportation charges shall not in all cases be made public it is difficult to conceive. Their publicity, as provided for in the House bill, is the one essential means of protecting shippers against unjust discriminations by means of rebates or other secret means of discrimination.

These companies serve the public for hire, and are under legal obligations as common carriers to serve them equally and impartially. Secrecy in rates is a badge of fraud in such cases, as it is by means of this secrecy that they are enabled to wrong some of their patrons while they benefit others, to impoverish some while they enrich others by their unjust discriminations.

And it is by these secret rates that they assert a sort of moral, mental, and commercial despotism over all shippers, and make each merchant or shipper suspect all others of getting special and favored rates, and drives them to seek by unmanly and dishonorable means to secure such special favors for themselves and advantages over their neighbors. Can anything more humiliating and demoralizing be conceived than this practice of secret frauds by transportation companies, constantly inviting so large a part of the people to seek to make themselves parties to fraud of this kind? No government and no people ought to submit to such a condition of things.

The Senate bill provides that no advance in rates shall be made except after ten days' public notice, while the House bill provides that no advance in rates shall be made upon less than five days' public notice. This shorter notice has been provided for in the House bill to meet the wishes of the railroad companies, as it was urged by them to prevent attempts of these roads to take advantage of each other by reducing rates and retaining the advantages of the reduced rates for too long a time.

I think it would be well to amend the House bill by inserting at the end of section 5 that part of section 5 of the Senate bill, from line 50 to line 77 inclusive; striking out the reference to commissioners, in lines 60 and 61, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and be sued out by the district attorney of the United States at the relation of any party interested;" and by striking out, in line 63, the word "commissioners" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "parties."

Another reason for the publication of freight rates, which should be controlling, is that in questions before the courts involving the reasonableness of such charges, when the rates are not authoritatively published it is not difficult for railroad experts in the interest of the companies to defeat just demands for damages by confusing juries with artful statements of what they term all the elements which enter into the questions as to the reasonableness of rates. While if they are required to post up their schedules of rates they can not deny that those posted up are reasonable, nor escape the penalty of charging more or less than their schedule rates. These schedules of rates would not only advise the people what they would have to pay but they would furnish the evidence of what reasonable rates are. The first section of the House bill requires that all rates shall be reasonable. The making of an unreasonable schedule of rates would subject them to the penalties prescribed by the bill. These two sections of the bill would greatly protect the people against improper charges.

The second section of the House bill provides, among other things, that "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons carrying property, as aforesaid, to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights of different and competing railroads, or to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them, and in case of an agrement for the pooling of freights or earnings, as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense."

This is a clear, specific provision for the prevention of pooling.

The nineteenth section of the Senate bill is as follows:

The said commission shall specifically inquire into the methods of railroad management or combination known as pooling, and shall report to Congress what, if any, legislation is advisable or expedient upon that subject.

The House bill provides for action. The Senate bill proposes inquiry.

Pooling by railroad is prohibited by the constitution of the States of Arkansas, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. It is prohibited by the laws of other States. Pooling is a violation of the common law, because it is a restraint upon the freedom of trade and a conspiracy against the public welfare. And this doctrine is maintained in the following American cases: 8 Mass., 223; 1 Pickering, 450; 35 Pickering, 188; 19 Pickering, 51; 35 Ohio State Reports, 672; 68 Pennsylvania State, 173; 5 Denio, 434; 4 Denio, 349.

Judge Gibson, in the case of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against Carlisle (Brightly, 40), says:

I take it that a combination is criminal whenever the act has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public or to oppress individuals by unjustly subjecting them to the power of confederates. "The object of these combinations is to raise the rate of freight, and the means adopted is to suspend competition and place the traffic under the exclusive control of the combination."

In the early history of railroad construction the anxiety of the people of this country to secure their construction induced them to grant charters without much reference to those safeguards necessary for the security and welfare of the people. It was understood then, as now, that each railroad would have a monopoly of the business of transportation on it. The people relied on three means of protection against monopoly prices:

First. On transportation by water and by other ordinary means of transportation.

Second. On the ultimate increase of the number of competing railroads; and Third. On the exercise of legislative control and regulation.

Experience has shown that the first two of these means do not protect the public against the unjust exercise of these monopoly powers; and that if not controlled by law they will defeat competition with each other by pooling combinations.

The railroad managers recommend a universal pool, or federation of all the railroads in the country, and its recognition and the enforcement of its provisions by law. This Congress has no power to do under the Constitution. If this could be done it would be the creation of one vast and overpowering monopoly out of the many which now exist; and such a course would enable it to control the transportation and commerce of the country, and soon perhaps to control the legislation of the country, and to become the masters of the people and of their liberties.

As evidence that there is real danger of this, I will refer briefly to four notorious pools in this country, which have each exercised vast power, and inflicted great injury on individuals, on other corporations, and on the whole country.

We are informed by Mr. Hudson in his valuable work entitled "The Railways and the Republic" that the live-stock pool, as it existed before 1880, granted a rebate of $16 per car to a prominent live-stock firm of Chicago, thus giving that firm that much of advantage over other shippers of live stock, and enriching it and the railroad officials who were confederated with it at the expense of other shippers of live stock, and creating an oppressive and odious monopoly in their hands.

Second. The standard oil pool and monopoly, to which some years back the great trunk railroads running into New York and Philadelphia paid $10,000,000 as rebates in sixteen months, which by the special advantages it secured from these railroads mercilessly crushed out all competition in the mining, refining, transportation, and sale of petroleum; and it has obtained such power over the great railroad corporations as to compel them to be subservient to its will. This monopoly and pool is so notorious, the evils it has inflicted on individuals and corporations and on the country are so great and so well known as to render a more particular reference to it unnecessary.

Third. The anthracite coal pool and monopoly is another of those monster and lawless combinations which depresses labor at its will, limits the amount and increases the price of anthracite coal for fuel in the great cities and for manufacturing purposes as its own interests may dictate. I quote again from Hudson on "Railways and the Republic." He says:

> It is not necessary to follow out in detail the steps by which the railways established their absolute power in all branches of the coal trade. Enough that the result is that of the 270,000 acres of anthracite coal lands in Pennsylvania 195,000 are now owned by six railways. One effect of uniting in the same corporations the business of shippers and that of carriers is the enormous inflation of their capital. Their aggregate capitalization amounts to $500,000,000, while the actual cost of the roads and equipment for transportation is $114,000,000.
> For the purpose of securing a profit on this stupendous amount of inflated capital the policy of combination has been carried to an unequaled extent.

The fourth great pool to which I shall refer is that of Central, Union and Southern Pacific and other transcontinental railroads and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

House Executive Document No. 60, first session Forty-ninth Congress, which I shall append to my remarks, shows:

First. That on the 6th of August, 1877, the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies entered into an agreement with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, by which they agreed to guarantee to this steamship company earnings to the amount of $27,000 per month on their business from San Francisco to New York, and $42,000 per month on their business from New York to San Francisco (making $996,000 per annum), upon the condition that these railroad companies should have the privilege of fixing the rates of transportation on the steamship lines.

Second. That on the 17th of January, 1879, a similar contract was made between these same parties by which a like sum of $996,000 was guaranteed by the railroad companies to the steamship company as gross freight earnings, and the railroad companies also guaranteed to the steamship company $5 on each passenger carried on tickets purchased at points east of Ogdensburg, Suspension Bridge, Pittsburgh, and Wheeling to points west of Sacramento, and vice versa.

Third. That on the 1st day of January, 1880, so much of the Southern Pacific Railroad as was necessary to consolidate the two roads was leased to the Central Pacific Railroad for the term of five years and until the Southern Pacific should be built to its connection with the Eastern railroads for the monthly rental of $250 per mile, for the purpose of controlling the rates of transportation and preventing competition.

Fourth. That on the 4th of March, 1880, another contract was entered into between these parties, by which these railroad companies guaranteed to this steamship company that its gross earnings should be $110,000 per month ($1,320,000 per annum) on condition that the railroad companies should have the right to fix the freight rates on the steamship company's line. This enabled these railroad companies to prevent any competition and gave them a complete monopoly of the transcontinental shipments, except what went by way of Cape Horn.

Fifth. That on the 10th of November, 1880, the portion of the Southern Pacific Railroad situated in Arizona was leased to the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

Sixth. That on November 17, 1880, the portion of the Southern Pacific Railroad situated in New Mexico was leased to the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

Seventh. That on the 17th of February, 1885, the Central Pacific Railroad and its branches was leased to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for the term of ninety-nine years from the 1st of April, 1885, for the annual sum of $1,200,000, thus consolidating these two lines of road and preventing competition.

Eighth. That on the 1st day of June, 1885, an agreement was entered into between the Transcontinental Association, composed of the following-named railroad companies, namely, the Southern Pacific, including the Central Pacific and its branches; the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe; the Atlantic and Pacific; the Burlington and Missouri Railroad; the Denver and Rio Grande Western; the Northern Pacific; the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company; the Oregon Short Line, and the Union Pacific, which association was represented by L. G. Cannon, its general agent, party of the first part, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, party of the second part.

By this agreement the above-named railroad companies obligated themselves to guarantee that the gross earnings of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company should be $85,000 per month on 1,200 tons of freight each way between San Francisco and New York by way of Panama, that the steamship company should make two trips per month and no more, and that it would not carry any steerage passengers; in consideration of which it was agreed by the steamship company that this transcontinental association should, through agents appointed by itself, "have the entire and exclusive control of all through business of said steamship company between New York and San Francisco each way, and that no through freight or passengers shall be taken except at prices to be fixed by these railroad corporations or by their consent."

Thus it is seen that these railroad companies erected one gigantic monopoly by the combination in this contract of nine railroads and some branch roads and the only steamship company plying between New York and San Francisco, and in this way provided that there should be no possible competition in freight and passenger charges on the immense amount of transportation and travel across the continent. Thus these great corporations, created by the consent and authority of the people through their legislative agents, instead of being operated in the interest of the people and for their benefit, entered into a monopolistic conspiracy in order to subject the commerce and travel of the country to any exaction which their avarice might dictate or their greed demand.

It appears from the annual report made by J. B. Houston, president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, now before me, and dated New York, May 27, 1885, a portion of which I will append to my remarks, that notice had been given in March, 1885, by this transcontinental association of railroads of the intended abrogation of their guarantee to the steamship company, which Mr. Houston says had existed for three years, and that a new arrangement had been entered into by which these railroad companies guaranteed to this steamship company $85,000 per month, $1,200,000 a year, to continue this monopoly.

As illustrative of the methods by which the railroad companies defeat just competition, establish monopolies, and levy unjust tributes on the commerce of the country, I have before me the printed form of a contract which was to be executed between the Union Pacific, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, the Missouri Pacific, and the Galveston, Harrisburg and San Antonio Railway Companies, and such persons as they might carry merchandise for.

By this agreement shippers were required to bind themselves, in order to avoid excessive rates, to ship all their merchandise during the term of the contract, which, it is understood, was not to be for a less time than one year, by the above-named roads; and the shippers were required to bind themselves, in substance, that if they should ship any part of their goods by any other route it was to be held as prima facie evidence of default on their part, and it was then to be optional with those railroads whether they would cancel the agreement and charge their higher rates on shipments, "or collect as liquidated damages a sum equivalent to the charges said goods would have been subject to if shipped by rail in accordance with the terms of this agreement."

This pool, not content with its extensive combination, adopted this extraordinary means of forcing shippers to contract in advance to send all their merchandise over their lines, or pay the penalty of not doing so by paying much higher rates of freight than those specified in the contract. And the terms of the contract, which I can not take time to read, show that two of the objects which the railroads expected to accomplish by these contracts were to prevent the competition of other railroads and of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

I quote the following from the New York Times of March 14, 1886, to show that the Transcontinental Association of Railroads, to which I have referred, in the exercise of its powers as a monopoly, conferred on another great and odious monopoly, the Standard Oil Company, a complete control of the oil trade on the Pacific slope, in the great plains, and in the Rocky Mountain region.

A circular recently issued for the information of railroad companies on the Pacific coast shows that the Standard Oil Company has used transcontinental lines to ruin competitors and build up its monopoly as it has used Eastern roads to accomplish the same objects. This circular gives notice that, owing to the transcontinental railroad war and the cutting of freight rates, the Standard's contract for a special rate from Chicago westward has been abrogated. It appears that under this contract the company's oil was carried from Chicago to California for 72½ cents per 100 pounds, while all other shippers were obliged to pay a rate of $1.20. The contract has been in force since 1884. The roads that have been used in this way to give to this company complete control of the oil trade of the Pacific slope were built in part with Government money and the proceeds of the sale of public lands. The facts in the case furnish a strong argument in support of a proper regulation of interstate commerce by law.

I also quote an editorial paragraph from the Washington Post of April 8, 1886, going to show how these corporations enrich themselves by the dishonorable means of watering their stocks, and overtax the commerce of the country and oppress the laboring people, in order that they may increase the value of their stocks or obtain dividends on this fraudulent stock.

There is a very general belief that the laboring classes are subjected to much injustice at the hands of the monopolizing capitalists who employ them. There is not a railroad corporation in the country which has not watered its stock to such a degree that its ostensible capital is largely fictitious. To create a market value for these fictitious shares a profit must be earned and a dividend declared, which can only be done by reducing wages to the lowest possible point. There results from this necessity a grinding pressure downward upon labor, which is grievance enough.

It will thus be seen that these corporations boldly enter into conspiracies in restraint of trade, in violation of the principles of the common law, and that with reckless audacity they defy constitutional provisions and statute laws, while they impudently set at naught the great fundamental principle imbedded in all our State constitutions denouncing monopolies as being contrary to the genius of liberty.

The cases I have presented on this subject are merely examples of what is constantly occurring in the matter of railroad pools all over the country, and so successful have the railroad corporations been in thus defying constitutions and laws, in levying unlawful exactions upon the commerce of the country, in plundering the people, in oppressing labor, and in assuming and exercising powers which neither the Federal nor the State government claims to possess or would dare to exercise, that they now ask that pooling be sanctioned by law, and claim that the adoption of a universal pool is the remedy for all grievances on this subject. With a knowledge of all these notorious facts, all that we are offered by the Senate bill on this subject is that "a railroad commission shall specifically inquire into that method of railroad management or combination known as pooling, and shall report to Congress what, if any, legislation is advisable and expedient on that subject."

I trust this House will show a higher appreciation of constitutional principles, a firmer purpose to see that the statute law and the principles of the common law shall be respected and enforced, that these corporations are not greater than their creators, and that the interests of the people shall be upheld and their rights respected, by forbidding pooling in unmistakable terms.

Another difference between the Senate and House bills is that the Senate bill provides for a commission to be known as the interstate-commerce commission, to be composed of five commissioners to be appointed by the President, to hold their offices for six years and to receive salaries of $7,500 a year each and their traveling expenses. These commissioners are empowered to appoint a Secretary with a salary of $3,000 a year and traveling expenses. It also has authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employés as it may find necessary, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The House bill makes no provision for a commission. And here I beg to call special attention to the theory of these two bills. The Senate bill is framed on the theory of securing a detailed regulation of freight and passenger rates, though it neither fixes any rates nor authorizes the commission to fix rates. In this it seems to be strangely illogical.

The House bill proceeds on the theory of abridging the monopoly powers of the railroad companies, and of prohibiting the greater and more manifest violations of right by them, without attempting a detailed regulation of freight rates; and provides for the enforcement of its provisions through the courts of ordinary jurisdiction, which are within convenient reach of the people, and with whose methods of procedure they are familiar.

The Senate bill proposes to enforce its provisions by bureau orders and the proceedings of courts combined. The American people have as a rule great respect for law and for the action of the judiciary, but they are not accustomed to the administration of the civil law through bureau orders. This system belongs in fact to despotic governments; not to free republics. And I submit with due respect that the House bill will secure more ample, prompt, and perfect protection to the rights of the people, with less friction and embarrassment to the railroad companies, than the Senate bill, if it should be executed honestly and in good faith. A careful perusal of the two bills will, I think, convince any impartial mind of the truth of this statement. The Senate bill is, however, preferred by the railroad corporations, because under it they see greater chances for trickery and evasion; with whatever chances there may be for their controlling in their interest the appointment of the commission, or of controlling the commission in their interest after it shall be appointed; and because the Senate bill puts the commission between the complaining citizen and the railroad, instead of allowing the citizen to appeal directly to the courts for redress of his wrongs, as the House bill does.

When we remember that this commission is to be composed of five persons only, that all their judgments are to be rendered in Washington city, though it may send members of the board to different parts of the country to make inquiry and to take testimony; when we consider that it will have at least 130,000 miles of railroad to look after and to extend its supervision to, and that the roads cover the thirty-eight States and eight Territories of the Union, with their 60,000,000 of population, and transport not less than $15,000,000,000 worth of interstate commerce annually, it will be seen how utterly impossible it will be for one tribunal composed of five men holding their official sessions at one place to successfully regulate and supervise this vast field of transportation with all its numberless causes of controversy and litigation.

When we consider the number of district and circuit court judges and judges of the Supreme Court, of the Court of Claims, and of the District of Columbia, and the Territorial judges which it is found necessary to employ in the enforcement of Federal legislation, without reference to the larger number of judges of the State courts, we may be better prepared to understand how futile the attempts will be for five railroad commissioners to attend to all the controversies growing out of railroad management in this country.

But I have other objections to the appointment of a commission. I shall fear that the railroad interests will combine their power to control the appointment of the commissioners in their own interest. We all understand how easy it is for a few persons controlling large interests to unite their influence to carry out their wishes. However honest and patriotic a President of the United States may be, and however anxious he might be to secure a good and faithful commission, he would in a large measure have to depend on the information of others in appointing them. The great body of the people would be poorly qualified to give advice about such appointments, and if they were able to give good advice it is not practicable for them to unite in the recommendation of proper persons.

The notorious facts as to how railroad managers have corruptly controlled Legislatures, courts, governors, and Congress in the past give us sufficient warning as to what may be expected of them in the future. It is not to be supposed that they would directly approach any President of the United States and corruptly propose to secure the appointment of commissioners in their own interest; but the vast resources which they control, with the power of levying any tribute they please on the commerce of the country to secure means for the employment of men, enables them to control the best legal and business talent of the country, and would enable them to procure influential men in their interest to appeal to the President in the name of justice and on account of capacity to appoint such men as would serve their purposes.

To this line of observation the answer has heretofore been made that we trust the President to appoint our judges, and why not to appoint railroad commissioners? The answer to this is that judges are not selected to deal with one single great interest, but for the general administration of the law, embracing all questions for judicial determination under the Constitution, treaties and laws of the United States; while these commissioners are to deal with questions which relate to the duties of common carriers alone, but questions of daily occurrence, and interests involving billions of dollars, concentrated in a few persons, some of whom have proven themselves utterly unscrupulous. The success of a commission would depend upon the integrity, independence, and power to resist flattery and temptation of its members; while the courts, Federal and State, which would be required to adjudicate questions arising under the House bill, would be so numerous that there would be much less probability of their being tempted or tampered with. Nor can we judge what the result of the action of a commission for the whole United States would be from what has been done in a single State by a State commissioner.

In Mr. Hudson's book, which is the only one on this subject I have met with written in the interest of the people, in which great industry is shown in the collection and consideration of facts connected with railway management, it is said, on pages 339 and 340:

No matter how stringent or specific the law may be in prohibiting extortionate rates, discrimination, or pooling, its effectiveness, if its enforcement is put into the hands of a commission, will depend entirely upon the vigor and faithfulness of that body. What guarantee have we in the provisions of the bill or in the influences that would control the selection of commissioners that they would display these qualities? It must be remembered that this legislation seeks to restrain the greatest power in the country, except the united and aroused popular will. It confronts not a local or private wrongdoer, but the organized and combined power of the railway corporation, with unlimited political influence, infinite resources for corruption, and secret methods for controlling appointments and legislation.

This power has kept courts in its pay, it defies the principles of common law, and nullifies the constitutional provisions of a dozen States; it has many representatives in Congress and unnumbered seats in the State Legislatures. No ordinary body of men can permanently resist it. Here is the fatal weakness of laws establishing railway commissions, whether their other provisions be radical or mild. If, by any happy suspension of the nature of things, the stream turned out to be purer than its source, what hope is there that it could be kept clear and undefiled under the corrupting influences which would await it at every turn of its future course? It is possible that, in obedience to an imperative public demand, such a body might be organized with the sincere purpose of restraining and preventing corporate abuses. The popular will has established such bodies in one or two States.

But legislation must regard the future and seek a remedy that will be effective, not merely for the next year or two but for future generations. Let popular vigilance be lulled, or the public attention directed to other issues, and will not this stealthy and almost resistless power gradually fill the commission with its tools, or win over the members to its purposes? It is idle to hope that a board of nine commissioners, with salaries such as a great railway pays its third-class subordinates, will permanently remain superior to the manifold forms of pressure and corruption that can be exerted by four thousand millions of railway capital, until it has been demonstrated that a housemaid's mop can keep back the tides of the Atlantic Ocean.

I read also as follows from pages 341 and 342:

Such a body would sooner or later become a mere bulwark or outpost for the defense of corporate abuses, instead of a fortress of popular rights. To expect this is simply to recognize the limitations of human strength when pitted against the vastest power for corruption ever known. The result of the unequal match is as certain as if nine men, however expert and strong, were ordered to stand in the path and arrest the destructive course of a mountain avalanche.

The force of this objection to the regulation of the railways by a few commissioners is shown in the history of such bodies, when established by State legislation. Railway commissions are in existence in Massachusetts, New York, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Colorado, and California. Some of these are invested with large powers, while some are merely supervising and advisory boards. Only two of these bodies have, within four years, made any active effort to restrain abuses which have aroused the press and the public to impatience. The other six, for any practical benefit they have secured to the people, might as well have charge of regulating the movements of the heavenly bodies.

It is instructive to notice that the effectiveness of these boards appears to have no relation to the thoroughness or radicalism of the legislation by which they are established. The Georgia railway commission has perhaps as great powers as were ever proposed for any such body; and its energy in enforcing them has attracted the enmity of the railways, which have recently demanded the restriction of the powers of the commission. The California commission, with powers almost if not quite as great, has not vitality enough to make even a passing impression on the sway of the Central Pacific over California commerce. The Illinois commissioners, holding about the same powers proposed by the Cullom bill, with the additional prerogative of prescribing maximum rates, has of late years shown a disposition to investigate and correct the most serious of the abuses which it is its duty to check.

The commissions of other States exhibit varying evidences of inefficiency, from futile attempts to restrain corporate powers to superogatory efforts to strengthen the railways in their supremacy over commerce. It is a significant measure of the adequacy of this device that even in Illinois, where the commission was established in obedience to the same overwhelming public demand for regulation of the railways which produced the famous Granger legislation, it served for several years only to show how useless and lifeless such a guardianship of the public interests can be. And even now the charge is made in that State, through the press, that the railroads, in violation of the law, are making unjust discriminations whenever it suits the convenience and interest of some pool, and that the commissioners are doing nothing to protect the people's interests.

I also read the following from pages 348 and 349:

A plan which, among the State commissions already constituted, results in, at most, two out of eight that are efficient and useful, does not promise to grapple successfully with the vast railway powers of the entire country in the interest of independent commerce. The power which has converted the Charles Francis Adams of 1875 into the Charles Francis Adams of 1885 can not be conquered and held in subjection by any body of nine men at salaries of $7,500 each. Such legislation as results, in the greatest State of the Union, in a commission which, constituted for the public protection, assumes the guardianship of the railways and proposes to limit competition by forbidding capital and the public to build new roads will never adequately protect the public interests. To put such a body of weak and fallible men in charge of the vast interests of combined railway capital is not less fatuous than it would be to station a pigmy sentinel at the door of the treasure-house and bid him guard it against an enemy.

Instead of such a system, the House bill provides that any citizen aggrieved by a violation of its provisions may appeal directly to a court and jury for redress, and that he may proceed both by civil suit and by criminal prosecution.

The question as to which of these plans should be adopted has in three different Congresses in the last few years been passed on by this House, and on each occasion the House by a large majority declared in favor of the plan presented by the House bill as best for the general welfare.

Having called attention to the leading points of difference between the Senate and House bills I desire to state that after several years' study on this subject I do not believe it possible to successfully control the action of the railroad corporations in the interest of the public without embracing in the plan for this purpose three important features, to which I desire now to call particular attention.

The first is the necessity of prohibiting the charging of more for the carriage of a like amount and kind of freight for a shorter than a longer haul, which includes the shorter on the same road. The violation of this principle enables the railroads to collect from a part of the people the cost of carrying the freights of another part of the people. It causes freight rates at competing points to be put down at rates which do not pay for their carriage, and to tax the people at non-competing points enough more than it is worth to carry their freights to make up for the loss of revenue on the freight hauled from competing points. This practice reduces the value of commodities which are to be shipped from non-competing points, reduces the value of farms and other property dependent on shipments from non-competing points, and renders manufacturing and all employments requiring skilled labor dependent on such points of less value. It is a policy which augments the wealth and prosperity of people at competing centers of trade, while it impoverishes those who live at non-competing points in the smaller towns and rural parts of the country. Neither the Government of the United States nor those of the several States can sanction or tolerate a policy or practice which works such manifest and flagrant injustice to so large a part, indeed to a large majority, of our people.

The second essential feature in a just policy of railroad regulation is that freight rates and charges should be plainly stated in schedules, which should be posted up in public view at all places of shipment. Most railroad companies profess to do this now, but the violation of their schedules is more the rule of their action than the observance of them. The allowance of special rates, of rebates, of cut rates, &c., is resorted to for the benefit of those on whom these companies choose to confer special favors; and in many cases, perhaps most cases, where it is done, officers of the railroads, faithless alike to the public and to the stockholders of these roads, are beneficiaries in and grow rich upon these frauds.

By this policy they can and do injure the trade of some places and build up the trade of others; and by it they enrich some men while they impoverish others, make some prosperous while they drive others out of business. That these wrongs are of constant occurrence in all parts of the country is notorious. That Congress has the power to prevent them is not doubted, as far as relates to interstate commerce. That this is not done is not creditable to either the intelligence or the integrity of Congress. These wrongs can never be avoided or corrected until freight rates are required to be made public, and until it is made a punishable crime and a subject of legal damage to charge more or less than the published rates. This is provided for in the House bill. It is not provided for in the Senate bill.

The third great essential principle necessary to a successful protection of the public against the improper and injurious conduct of the railroad companies is that the pooling of the business and earnings of competing railroads shall be prohibited. The competition of competing roads is the only real check now on the monopoly powers they possess. Monopolies are denounced by the common law. They are denounced by our State constitutions and laws. They all injuriously restrict trade. They tend to distress and impoverish any people and any country in which they hold sway. They are of the very essence of despotism, oppression, and wrong; and no free people ought to submit to them nor can do so long and remain a free people.

The establishment and enforcement of these three principles are fought harder by the railroad representatives, because they are valued most by them as the means of giving them the sole control of the commerce and the mastery of the business and wealth of the country. Hence they favor the Senate bill and oppose the House bill.

In urging the special importance of these three great principles I do not wish to be understood as undervaluing many others. To make this regulation effective, we must require all charges to be reasonable. We must require that there shall be no discriminations in charges as between individuals. We must provide against evasions of the law. We must provide for the production and inspection of the books and papers of these corporations, and compel their officers and agents to testify when necessary to the ends of justice. And we must enforce all these principles through the courts of ordinary jurisdiction, with the proceedings of which our people are familiar, and where justice can be had speedily and cheaply, at the hands of an honest court and a jury of twelve men. All these things the House bill provides for. Many of them the Senate's bill does not provide for. How long shall the American people wait for this measure of necessary protection and justice?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], in the first place, to a few words said by him on the 16th day of March last, when he reported this bill from the Committee on Commerce. I wish the gentleman from Texas would listen to these words which he then uttered and which I will read. They are as follows:

Mr. REAGAN. So far as I am concerned, I shall be disposed to allow reasonable debate; but I should not desire to see the debate run to an unreasonable extent. The subject has been so much discussed heretofore that I take it a very great length of time will not be required for its discussion. But I desire to see full and fair debate.

Such was the utterance of the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, when he reported the bill to the House; and he said at other times that he was in favor of such a full debate as would enable each member of that Committee on Commerce to have one hour if he so desired. I suppose the gentleman's understanding of full debate has been shown to the House by his occupying a full hour and five minutes. I presume that was done by the consent of others who had the privilege of speaking on that side if they wished to do so.

The gentleman has not forgotten his speeches of the past. He is not tired of speaking of the railroads as "oppressive monopolies." He is not tired of referring to the Standard Oil Company. I have understood the Standard Oil Company is not a factor and has not been for some years in the question of freights carried by railroads. That has been my understanding. If any gentleman present knows to the contrary I shall be glad to be corrected.

But in view of the short time we are to have for this general debate I am desirous my colleagues composing the minority of the Committee on Commerce so far as the Reagan bill is concerned shall be afforded some time out of the hour and five minutes at my disposal under the resolution limiting general debate to two hours and ten minutes to be heard, and therefore I shall not occupy the whole of that time, but will yield a portion to them.

I have before me a great deal of printed matter which I believed I would have an opportunity of reading to the House, practical in its character and bearing on this question, matter convincing to my mind, and I consider myself a man little given to prejudices on this or any other question. But if I can not read it to the House, I shall take advantage of the unanimous consent which has been granted to include it in my printed remarks.

I am, Mr. Speaker, as much in favor of passing a proper interstate commerce bill as the gentleman from Texas, or any other advocate of the measure either of the Committee on Commerce or of the House. In all sincerity, I will say that I am opposed to all unjust discrimination wherever it may be.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Why not go for the Reagan bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Because the Cullom bill is more anti-discrimination than the Reagan bill.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. That is altogether a discrimination bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I will say that the Cullom bill is less discriminating than the other. It iterates and reiterates from beginning to end anti-discrimination provisions concerning rebates and drawbacks and every other point involved in this discussion. The Senate bill is emphatically an anti-discrimination bill.

Mr. ROWELL. Do you say it does not allow discrimination when the commission approves of it?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I say that in a statesman-like way the Senate bill allows questions to be referred to the interstate-commerce commissioners. I say in that respect it is superior to the iron-clad bill of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the Senate bill put it in the power of the commission to exempt any road they see proper from the operations, and therefore is not that the grossest kind of discrimination if it be true?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, it does. It does it in the right direction. It does it in the direction of accommodating the people who have freights to send by railroad.

Mr. CALDWELL. Could they not by that means ruin one system of railroads to build up another?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Why this Reagan bill will ruin all systems of railroads and all progress in building them and all endeavors to get capital to keep them up or to construct new lines.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Does not the Cullom bill allow the roads to discriminate between persons who ship under similar circumstances?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Exactly, and so it should. That is just the difference between the Cullom and the Reagan bills, and just what I favor. But I may say here that I would be satisfied with a purely commission bill, such as was presented here in this and in a former Congress by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON], and also in the last Congress by Mr. Horr, of Michigan. I would be willing to intrust to the commission all of the questions that might arise between the shippers and the carriers of freight.

Now, I desire to have read to the House the report of the minority of the Committee on Commerce on this bill, as I fear under the limit to the debate these gentlemen will not have any opportunity of discussing at length the provisions of either of the pending propositions, and I will ask that this be read from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The minority, never for one moment seeking to depreciate the importance of enacting a law upon the subject of interstate commerce, but believing that wise and well-digested legislation will be gladly accepted by the people and by the railroad companies engaged in transportation between the States and between the United States and adjacent foreign countries, have looked with due deliberation upon this matter as one equally as grave as any pending before Congress.

The interstate commerce of the country, which it is proposed to supervise and regulate, now passes over more than 125,000 miles of railway, representing an investment approaching $8,000,000,000, upon which during the year 1884 nearly 350,000,000 passengers and nearly 400,000,000 tons of freight were carried, while during the same period transporters upon water ways, natural and artificial, in most instances competitors of the railways, carried less tons of freight and fewer passengers; yet their proportion was very large.

While it is remembered that a large portion of this freight and passenger traffic will be directly affected by the provisions of the proposed bill, usually designated as the Reagan bill, it should be borne in mind that the interstate freight traffic carried over the railroads of the United States is composed largely of products coming in direct competition with the products of foreign countries. The American railways having to meet these products in the markets of the world upon equal terms, it can readily be seen that the question of regulating the rates upon that freight traffic is a most serious one. The cost of transportation directly affects the price at which the citizen of the United States is enabled to place his products in those common markets, and any unwise restriction or regulation may render it impossible for him to meet his competitors on even terms, and may thus seriously cripple many of the leading industries of our country.

It will be seen at a glance that cotton, coal, wheat, provisions and breadstuffs of all kinds, and generally all commercial and agricultural products, form the great bulk of the interstate commerce of the country, and it is universally conceded that through the system pursued by the railways in the past these industries have been extensively developed, and the United States brought into a position where a very large portion of its debt has been paid off and its prosperity enormously increased. That this could not have been accomplished except for the extraordinary reductions made by the railways in their rates upon traffic, which reductions have enabled the products of the most distant portions of our country to be transported by rail to the seaboard and thence by water to foreign countries, must be very clear. Certainly no serious ground of complaint can exist when figures show that in the last thirteen years the rates upon traffic have gradually been reduced from about 2½ cents per ton per mile to about 7 mills, and when dividends and interest upon the capital invested in railways during the year 1884 did not exceed 3½ per cent.

It can readily be seen how, in the management of so enormous a traffic, it is absolutely necessary that there should be entire flexibility in the adjustment of rates to meet the varying circumstances presented, and it is not believed that any "cast-iron" rules can be laid down for the regulation of this enormous traffic without seriously interfering with it and directly and vitally affecting the prosperity of the country.

The minority of the committee, therefore, have not favored the insertion of the provision preventing, under all circumstances, the granting of drawbacks or rebates, because cases were cited before the Committee on Commerce, in hearings, in which drawbacks or rebates were absolutely necessary to enable the domestic shipper to meet his foreign competitor on equal terms; always, however, in the opinion of the minority, having the system of drawbacks or rebates open to all under similar conditions and circumstances.

Nor do the minority favor the provision prohibiting a greater charge for a shorter than a longer haul, as it was shown to a satisfactory degree, as we think, in the hearings, that where two competing points were connected by water as well as rail, it was impossible for the railways to secure the traffic unless they made their rates as low as the water rates, and that while they might be able to do this on a portion of their traffic, it would be destructive of their interests to reduce all their rates to those which were forced upon them between certain points by the competition of the water routes. The minority consider that in this, also, unjust discrimination should never be made, but that the idea of charging the same rate for the haul under similar conditions and circumstances should be adhered to.

The minority also differ from the majority upon the subject of "pooling." They believe its absolute prohibition is unnecessary. There should be legislation imposing restrictive provisions, for shippers should not be placed at a disadvantage or competition in freight charges lessened so that transporters only should be benefited. If fairly carried out and not done by secret and private arrangement, if resorted to for the purpose of preventing what is called injudicious "cutting down" of rates, so that reasonable and just charges should be permanently adhered to, are the means by which transporters endeavor, or ought to endeavor, to secure fair rates upon the traffic which they carry, "pooling" would not be open to many of the objections made to it.

Past experience in railway transportation has satisfied transporters that the "pool" is the nearest and fairest device yet used to enable them to place shippers upon an equality and prevent grievous discrimination in favor of the large shippers as against the smaller ones.

But we appreciate the difficulty of satisfactorily legislating upon this subject, and would prefer to leave it to the consideration of a board of interstate-commerce commission, which tribunal we hope will be created. So much for what the minority suggest as to the drawback or rebate, the longer and shorter haul, and the "pooling" systems. Proper notification of the changing of rates, with the limitation of a reasonable time, publicly posted in stations judiciously selected in accordance with the amount of freight offered, upon an equitable annual average, might also be conducive of confidence of the shipper in the transporter. A carefully digested section might be incorporated in the law to meet this point.

The conclusion of the minority is, however, unfavorable to positive legislation other than the above suggested, believing that it is impossible for Congress, limited necessarily in practical knowledge of railway movements, prejudiced perhaps against the railway system by some local disagreements not yet settled, led to think that an occasional instance of what appears to be unfair dealing with the shipper is the transporter's general course, and beg leave to suggest that the most available present remedy for imaginary as well as real grievances is the creation by law of a board of interstate-commerce commission.

It is the province of legislators to ascertain by intelligent experience the legislation required, and that experience can best be secured through the proposed commission. It should be a permanently-established bureau of an appropriate department; should be composed of the ablest men of the country; salaries should be large enough to attract men from the very highest and most lucrative positions of the varied business life of our citizens. This board should have power to investigate all complaints connected with the management of interstate commerce; power to secure their redress through the voluntary action of transporters or through legal proceedings instituted by it through the proper legal officers of the United States.

We desire to impress the House with our implicit belief in the present advantage of a board of interstate-commerce commissioners. We ask you to defer radical legislation until we have tried the commission, which, with powers to hear grievances, will also be required to report annually to Congress, and to suggest from time to time the legislation necessary to create harmony between shippers and transporters.

All which we submit.

CHAS. O'NEILL.
ROBERT T. DAVIS.
RANSOM W. DUNHAM.
FREDERICK A. JOHNSON.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have stated the reasons why I have had the report read. I wish to have the views of the minority placed upon the RECORD, and thought it might as well come in here as elsewhere.

Now, that report follows out the idea from the beginning to the end of anti-discrimination. I am glad to be able to say that the Senate bill almost carries out the ideas presented in the minority report of the House Committee on Commerce, without any consultation at all with Senators who composed the Cullom committee. That report, which is very conservative—a very conservative report, indeed, but very anti-discriminating in its views—is the report that the minority of the committee present, and the report which recommends the establishment of a commission in the legislation upon the subject of drawbacks or rebates and upon the long and short haul question and the manner of publishing changes in freight charges for the public information. It purposes to leave "pooling" to the consideration of the commission.

I will say further to the gentleman from Texas, or to any other gentleman who does not favor an interstate-commerce commission, that it must be known very well that no bill to regulate interstate-commerce can become a law that has not a provision creating a commission of interstate-commerce commissioners.

The Senate bill has in it legislation I do not approve of, and I shall propose to amend it if I have an opportunity when it comes before the House for consideration under the five-minute rule. I shall offer an amendment in the first place that this bill shall apply to all carriers, not only to carriers by railroads, but to carriers on the water ways of the country as well. And I think if the gentleman from Texas had been sincere in the last ten or twelve years in his agitation of the subject he would have had his bill apply to common carriers alike and subject them to the same conditions, or else place himself in the attitude that he was probably in the interest of the water ways as against the railroads of the country.

Now I refer the members of this House to the speech made in the Senate by Mr. BROWN upon this subject, and to the number of statistics incorporated in that speech, in which he shows the transportation paid to the water ways as compared with railroad transportation upon the Ohio, Lower Mississippi, and other rivers, which establishes the fact just as absolutely as anything can be established that they are endeavoring to charge and are actually charging for short hauls more than for long hauls, and have continued to do it, and will continue to do it, unless we insert a condition in this bill that its provisions shall apply to the water ways of the country as well as to the railways. In that respect I differ with my colleagues on the Committee on Commerce who have joined in the minority report, and I would have liked to have recommended in the report the insertion of the water ways. I think there are other members of the committee, other than the four who signed the report, who favor introducing the water ways and making the clearest and most stringent provisions of both the House and the Senate bills applicable to all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman would not have the House infer from what he said that all of the minority are in favor of undertaking to regulate water ways?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. By no means. On the contrary, I stated just the reverse, that I differed with my colleagues in the minority in that respect, as I believe in making it applicable to all carriers. Why should it not be? There are millions of dollars invested in steamboat transportation and other kinds of transportation upon the rivers—millions of dollars. There are corporations upon corporations, and there are individuals who are enabled to enter into combinations as carriers by water ways just as great and obstructive to commerce as far as they go as those alleged to be made by the railroad companies in regard to freight, and yet, sir, if we carry out the ideas embodied in the Reagan bill, if the House takes that bill, we make the water ways of the country still more liable to combine as to charges for freight.

They control those charges now, but when we pass that bill they will control it more, and just as they want to, in reference to short and long hauls. In other words, the carriers by water are the great competitors of the railway carriers of this country in whatever part of the country water and rail come in competition. I believe that if all carriers were included in the Reagan bill or in the Cullom bill the railroad companies would almost be willing to accept the proposed legislation, especially the legislation sought for by the Cullom bill. For seven months in the year, or nearly that long, the water ways are absolute in fixing the freight rates of the railroads.

So I propose to offer that amendment to the Cullom bill. I shall also offer a further amendment, that a license shall be taken out by all interstate commerce carriers of freight, to apply not only to carriers of freight of our own country but to foreign trunk lines doing interstate-commerce business in it. I am free to say that I want to bring under the provisions of either bill, the Senate bill or the Reagan bill, if possible, and I think it can be done, the great trunk line railway of Canada. I want to bring all roads that are competitors with our own upon the same basis.

Mr. DUNHAM. How?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. By requiring them to take out a license, and so modify section 7 of the Cullom bill as to make them in some way in their offices in this country, whether in Chicago or elsewhere, do exactly what is required to be done by the trunk lines of our own country.

Mr. DUNHAM. But take the Canadian Pacific road, which runs from the Pacific Ocean to Montreal, how are you going to prevent that line from taking all the business from the Northern Pacific?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If you allow them to regulate their freights and to raise and lower them as they please, are you not giving them an advantage over the Pacific lines in our own country?

Mr. DUNHAM. But you can not help it. They are entirely in Canada.

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, the Cullom bill, in section 7, proposes to help it, and I propose to offer an amendment when it comes before this House that will help that still more in another direction. I propose, if possible, to bind them in some way, bind their agents in the city of Chicago, for example, where there are connections of the American lines with them.

Mr. BYNUM. The House bill does that.

Mr. O'NEILL. The House bill tries to do it, but does not do it effectually. It does it in reference to the importation of goods; the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER] does that.

Mr. DUNHAM. It does it where freight, going from New York to Chicago, passes through Canada.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Well, of course we can not regulate the roads in Canada.

Mr. DUNHAM. But what I was speaking of was the business passing over the Canadian Pacific Railroad from the Pacific coast to Montreal. We may tie up our own roads by this legislation so as to let the Canadian line take the whole of that business, leaving none for the American lines.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. The only thing in which the Canadian roads would have an advantage over the railroads of the United States would be on through shipments from the United States into Canada and back into the United States, and in that particular we have put a provision in the bill which absolutely requires them to make public their rates.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. They are liable to take the entire China trade from us.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my time is so limited that I must insist upon resuming the floor.

Now, I would strike out of the Cullom bill also the clause bringing passenger traffic within its provisions. The idea of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] all along has been to regulate freight traffic, and his bill does not apply to passengers, but the Senate bill does. We are here endeavoring to regulate the carriage of interstate freight, not the carriage of passengers, which is an entirely different question. I shall seek to amend the Cullom bill in that particular.

Mr. Speaker, I am much hurried, because I can not selfishly take this whole hour and five minutes to myself, and I think I may avail myself of the general permission to print what my limit of time fixed in my mind, about forty minutes, prevents me from saying to the House.

I will propose an amendment increasing the salaries of $7,500 of the commissioners to $10,000 per annum. This amount would satisfy men of great distinction and great learning and of undoubted integrity to leave their private business to take such honorable positions. Believing that holding stock or bonds in a railroad company should not disqualify a man from accepting the office of a commissioner, I would strike out that inhibition in the Cullom bill and provide in its place that a commissioner should not take part in the decision of any complaint against such company of whose stock or bonds he might be an owner. Many of the wisest and purest men of the country might be prevented from taking such an office because of his legitimately owning railroad securities, while an upright man in any judicial position would decline to hear or decide a case in which he might have even a remote interest.

I confess that I have been over this question of interstate commerce again and again during the last ten years, just as the gentleman from Texas has been over it. I differ from him materially in regard to it, and let me add that the bill now presented by him is not the same bill that he presented ten years ago. He himself has had light upon this subject from some quarter, and the consequence is that the great ironclad features of his former bills do not all appear in this one. The reason I do not know, unless it be because he has been compelled reluctantly to listen in the committee-room to the explanations of practical railroad men, and has learned from those men, who have at heart the interests of the people whose freight is to be carried, and especially of those of the Western part of the country, that such legislation as the Reagan bill would be destructive of cheap freights, prompt carriage, and the general railroad interests. Many years have been required to bring our railroad system to its present accommodating position. Do not let us make it less useful; do not let us interfere with it by unwise legislation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that up to a recent date the argument of the railroads has been that there was no authority in Congress to regulate them?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That argument has been abandoned. I have never raised that point, and I never expect to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Nobody has raised it for ten years past. It was settled ten years ago.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes; that was settled long ago. There is no doubt that Congress can legislate upon this subject; but let Congress legislate as a number of the States have legislated. I can not tell exactly how many have established railroad commissions, but many have, the State of Massachusetts notably having a commission that does regulate these vexed questions until, as I understand, there is hardly a complaint on the subject of railroad freights in that State.

I assert here that in the broad State of Pennsylvania, with her six millions of people, with her vast railroad interests, with her immense volume of freight requiring to be carried from one end of the State to the other and to all parts of the country, there is scarcely a complaint today about what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] calls the excessive charges and discriminations of these "monopolies." The matter regulates itself. The railroads themselves have worked it out, so that within a few years the rate of freight charges has been reduced from 2½ cents per ton per mile to less than seven-tenths of a cent per mile. I will ask the Clerk to read the extract from a very conservative journal of the city of Philadelphia, the Public Ledger, which illustrates this matter of the reduction of freight charges upon the Pennsylvania Railroad.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Pennsylvania Railroad's freight tonnage moved 1 mile in 1885 was the largest in the history of the company, being 235,966,277 tons greater than the total tonnage moved 1 mile in the preceding year. The average rate per ton per mile charged to the shipper in 1885 was 0.627 cents, being the lowest rate ever received by the company since its organization, and 0.113 cents per ton per mile less than the rate received in 1884. In the year 1865 the total amount of freight moved 1 mile was 420,060,260 tons, a very large quantity for that period, but in 1885 the total tons of freight moved the same distance had grown to the enormous amount of 3,318,466,263 tons. In 1865 the average rate per ton per mile received for carrying freight was 2.665 cents, while in 1885 the average rate was but 0.627 cents. The amount of reduction in the charge for transportation in 1885, computed on the difference between the rate in that year and that which was charged in 1865, made a saving to shippers of $67,630,342.44. The total reduction for twenty years, computed upon the same basis, shows a saving of $565,238,590.22. Had the Pennsylvania Railroad charged 1 mill per ton per mile more for the transportation of freight in 1885 than the rate paid the receipts of the company would have been $3,318,466 greater than they were. The following statement, showing, for each year since 1865, the number of tons of freight moved 1 mile, the rate per ton per mile, and the amount of reduction in any given year by the Pennsylvania Railroad Division, computed on the difference between the rate in that year and that which was charged in 1865, will be found interesting:

Years.	Total tons one mile.	Average rate per ton per mile.	Amount of reduction each year, computed on rate of 1865.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The matter just read by the Clerk shows the millions of dollars saved within the last few years to the freight-senders of this country by the action of the railroads themselves; and the statement applies to other railroads as well as to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

On all important subjects of legislation we hear a great deal through the petition-box. Now, the petitions to this House on the one side or the other of this question come from only twelve or thirteen different sources; and almost all of these petitioners, be they commercial associations, supervisors of counties, boards of any kind, or individuals, recommend generally in so many words the Cullom bill, and there is but one of those petitions, and that coming from an almost insignificant town of this country, I mean in population, which recommends the passage of the Reagan bill.

What do the records of this House show in regard to this matter? We have resolutions favoring the Cullom bill from the Board of Trade of the city of Philadelphia, from the Legislature of the State of Iowa, from the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Cincinnati, and others. When we come to find who have sent in petitions opposing the bill, perhaps the most numerous petitions, all alike, from any section of the country come from a few towns in the county of Saint Croix, in the State of Wisconsin. I do not doubt that those people have an interest in the subject of interstate commerce; but they represent a county the whole population of which is not more than twenty-five or thirty thousand; while from the great centers of trade—Chicago, Saint Louis, Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, and Boston—we hear nothing in favor of the Reagan bill, but everything in favor of most of the provisions of the Cullom bill.

I hope to have an opportunity to offer such amendments to the Cullom bill as will enable me, if adopted, to vote for it. I believe that a commission of suitable men properly selected can better settle these questions than can members of Congress with their crude ideas. Certainly five men as fit, as virtuous, as incorruptible, and as able as the men who compose the Supreme Court of the United States can be selected by the President. Just as the country confides in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, so will the decisions of a carefully selected board of commissioners of interstate commerce satisfy the public mind.

In closing I ask the attention of members to the minority report from the Committee on Commerce which has been read by the Clerk. It contains the whole ground of my proposed action and I believe its suggestions to be unanswerable as far as the good of the business people of the country is concerned, and that the carriers of freight can not reasonably object to the passage of a law embracing the provisions proposed. Radical legislation would bring great injury to business, while proper laws upon this subject would meet the approval of the people. We are a business, progressive people, and Congress is expected so to legislate as to increase every interest and to injure none.

Mr. Speaker, I may, as I have said already, print much that I have left unsaid, and especially matter in print which I know would be read with interest by the members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM].

Mr. TURNER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] allow me to make an announcement?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

ELECTION CONTEST—PAGE VS. PIRCE.

Mr. TURNER. I desire to give notice that on Friday next I shall move to discharge the Committee on Elections from the further consideration of the contested-election case of Page vs. Pirce, from the State of Rhode Island, and ask the House to consider it.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE ONLY.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that, in accordance with the request of several gentlemen on both sides of the House, I am willing to withdraw my objection to the proposition which was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for a session this evening, from 8 o'clock to 11 o'clock, for debate only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] withdraws his objection to the request which was made by the gentleman from Texas, that a recess be taken at 5 o'clock to-day until 8 o'clock, the evening session not to continue beyond 11 o'clock, and to be devoted entirely to debate on this bill. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. The provisions of this bill for the regulation of interstate commerce by rail-carriage apply to a subject of enormous magnitude and of vital moment to the material interests of our country. The business of transportation by rail, viewed with reference to the tonnage and value of the merchandise moved, the amount of property invested in railroads, the aggregate extent of their mileage and the cost of operating them, and their intimate relations with our great producing interests, is one of vital importance. A glance at the census tables reveals the proportions of this great interest.

In 1884 the property invested in railroads amounted to $7,431,732,458, the entire taxable property of all the States of the Union being $19,790,333,650, the capital invested in all the manufacturing industries of the country (gas excepted) amounting to $2,790,223,506, the total value of farms in all the States and Territories being $10,197,096,776.

It will be seen that the property in railroads amounts to more than one and one-half times the capital employed in all the various manufactures of the country, with one inconsiderable exception, that it equals seven-tenths of the value of all the farms and 27 per cent. of all the taxable property of the States and Territories. It is represented by an immense net-work of railroad lines which extends from Maine to Texas, from Minnesota to Florida, from the lakes to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, aggregating more than 125,000 miles, 11,000 miles more than the entire railroad system of Europe.

The number of tons of freight carried on our railroads in 1884 equaled 390,074,749, valued at $9,751,868,725, and they transported during the same year 334,814,529 passengers. In doing this vast business nearly five hundred thousand men are employed, whose daily subsistence and that of their families are dependent upon the business of these roads.

At this moment serious controversies exist between the railroad managers and their employés. It is not to be doubted that they will soon terminate, their interests being substantially identical and the success of the industry being necessary to the prosperity of all classes of labor which it employs.

It has originated and sprung to these immense proportions within fifty years, much the larger part of its growth having occurred within the past twenty years. During this time it has been much the most important factor in the material progress of our country. It has so cheapened and expedited transportation that it has more than all other causes developed the resources of the great West. In its absence the great States of the Mississippi Valley could not a century hence have attained their present population, wealth, and overshadowing importance in our political system.

Undoubtedly there have been two periods in the history of our railroad system when it was extended beyond the natural requirements of the time, and when the vast sums expended in construction and equipment, followed by a sudden cessation of operations and the consequent decline in prices of material, leading to the stoppage of mills and the throwing out of employment of thousands of workmen, have tended to produce general business depression. From the results of one of these periods of morbid activity we are still laboring. There have been also serious evils connected with the building of railroads and the manipulation of their stocks, from which stockholders and bondholders have each suffered and which have driven many railroad corporations into bankruptcy. Still, spite of much unwise, extravagant, and dishonest management and illegitimate speculation, they have been constantly improving in their methods of administration.

Passenger fares and freight rates have been gradually lessening until the former average about 2 cents per mile and the latter 1 cent per ton for that distance. When we connect with this cheap transportation—much the cheapest in the world—the fact that owners of this vast interest are realizing dividends averaging only 2½ per cent. annually it would appear that there can be no existing grievance calling for stringent legislation.

No one disputes that there have been grave errors and much injustice in the management of many of our railroads, which to some extent exists to-day. The Reagan bill as a remedial measure has four leading features: First, the long and short haul provision; second, prohibitions of rebates; third, prohibition of pools, and fourth, publication of schedules. The first provision prohibits the charging of a lower rate for a longer than for a shorter haul.

The principle of this prohibition, while specious and even equitable when applied under substantially similar conditions, would frequently operate injuriously upon long-distance freight, would seriously cripple the business of interstate railroads, and would be of no advantage to the short-haul freight.

Let us suppose a road chartered in one of the States, and at first doing a local business, in process of time by purchase or lease or some arrangement it becomes a carrier of freight from Chicago to New York or Philadelphia or other points on our Atlantic seaboard. It there meets competition which always determines rates.

It competes with rival roads and also with lines of water transportation whose competition always compels the lowest rates of freight. Under such circumstances through rates must always be lower per mile than short-haul local freight. This is inevitable and inflicts no injury upon local shippers so long as such freight is not carried at a loss.

Railroad experts declare that this never occurs except for short periods during railroad wars. That railroads can carry through freight for long distances at extremely low rates without loss and even at a small profit is readily demonstrated. The cost of their road-bed is about 40 per cent. of the entire cost of the road and equipment. Now, if upon the entire capital invested the corporation makes some profit without carrying through freight, then it is clear that it can take that additional freight at the mere cost of the labor and fuel and the added wear and tear of the equipment and rails without incurring loss. If the rate be sufficient to do this and help a little toward paying the interest on the imperishable road-bed, it yields a profit and becomes a justifiable business transaction. Of course, other things being equal, the amount of the through business will determine the amount of the profit or whether there be any. If a certain number of tons of freight on a given train will pay running expenses, all over that amount will be carried at a profit.

I am now treating through freight as supplementary to the ordinary business of a road and sufficiently distinct from its ordinary local business to make it proper to establish independent rates. If through business is to be done at all, it is absolutely necessary to so regard it. The sharp competition of water routes compels the adoption of the lowest remunerative rates. The agricultural and commercial interests of the interior of our country demand them. The corn and wheat of the Mississippi Valley must reach the Atlantic seaboard at the least possible cost to find a domestic and foreign market. The manufactures of the East must be conveyed with equal facility and cheapness to all parts of the West, as this reciprocal interchange of raw and manufactured products at the least cost is equally essential to the material interests of all parts of our country.

I have no hesitation in asserting that this provision of the bill, if carried into effect, would strike a deadly blow at the interests of the Western farmer and at the general prosperity of the West, whose unrivaled development within the last quarter of a century has been owing in large degree to the extension of our railroad system. Its inevitable result would be to increase freight rates by rail to and from the great distributing centers and to diminish the amount of tonnage transported. It is claimed that the advantage to through shippers is secured at the expense of communities living on the line of the road because local rates are increased to make good the losses incurred through long-haul rates. And this assumption is the strongest reason assigned for the passage of this provision. In fact it lies at the very foundation of the logic which supports it.

This may be and probably is true during those railroad wars when freight is carried from competitive points at a loss, but so long as a profit, however small, is made on this description of traffic, there need be no increase of local rates, and the evidence of railroad managers is to the effect that they are not increased. Mr. Blanchard states that whenever a reduction takes place in the through rates, a reduction takes place in the local rates also. (See page 151, pamphlet.) Railroads are usually built to secure traffic along their lines, and so long as they encounter no competition they should adopt charges determined by mileage; but even then the ratio of increase for distance should not be fixed, but should be a diminishing one, otherwise the profit on the merchandise would not bear the cost of transportation over a long route. When the road finally extends, as it usually does, to a point where it encounters competition from other roads or water routes, it must reduce its rates to meet that competition or it can not do business.

It is clear, therefore, to me that the principle which prohibits inflexibly under all circumstances a less charge for a longer than for a shorter haul is unjust alike to the shipper and to the carrier, and would prove to be impracticable if its enforcement were attempted. This bill also prohibits rebates. This principle, when inflexibly applied to the almost infinitely various conditions which are connected with our enormous railroad traffic, would be mischievous in its effects. To discriminate between the same class of freight carriers under similar conditions is unjust, and ought to be prohibited under proper penalties. When a railroad company does this, and takes an unfair advantage of its power to injure the interests of one man and promote the interests of another, it commits an outrage which the strong arm of the law should punish. Unjust discriminations are difficult of detection, but whenever proven the offender should be dealt with promptly and rigorously. But there are circumstances under which rebates are justifiable.

Suppose coal mined on the line of the Reading Railroad to be carried at a certain rate per ton to its terminus at Philadelphia. A Boston coal-dealer offers a lower rate to that point, stating that if he can secure it it will enable him to pay water transportation and lay the coal down in Boston as cheap as he can procure it elsewhere. If they accede to his proposal it will enable the Schuylkill Valley miner to dispose of that additional amount of coal and it will furnish more business for the road. He does not secure the lower rate until the bill of lading or other evidence satisfies the railroad managers that the coal has been shipped from Philadelphia to Boston. Then he receives a rebate equal to the difference between his special rate and the usual rate. It is evident that this arrangement, while advantageous to the road and mine, inflicts no injury on the coal dealer in Philadelphia. Transactions of this character are understood to be of frequent occurrence. The same principle applies where the goods transported are intended for a foreign market.

In such cases it is necessary that the rate should be reduced in order to meet competitors abroad. Now every car-load of grain or cattle or pork or any of the agricultural products of the West that can be shipped to a foreign market is a relief to the farmer and helps to maintain an active demand at home. It is of vast advantage to him; it is just what he needs, desires, and must have. It does no possible injury to any interest; but on the contrary, in promoting the prosperity of that great interest upon which all others are based, it contributes to the benefit of all. Here again we see the impolicy of adopting an inflexible rule and attempting to enforce it. The conditions are so variable and complex that it is impossible to apply rigid and immutable legislation without doing great and ruinous injury to the producing as well as the transporting interests.

Such legislation after becoming a proved failure would be either repealed or remain a dead letter upon the statute-book, while the lessons of experience and the laws of trade and transportation would soon resume their normal sway. The remaining important feature of this bill is that of prohibiting pools. This I understand to be an expression to describe a combination between railroads to regulate and maintain rates. A combination to prevent natural and healthy competition and to fix undue and extravagant rates would be against the public interests, and would furnish just ground for repressive legislation.

This is a popular idea of a pool, and may be in some cases a just one.

There is, however, an arrangement which is the direct result of ruinous competition and which being absolutely necessary to prevent bankruptcy is expedient and justifiable. We have repeatedly seen on a great scale railroad wars so clearly unwise and dangerous as to call for some prompt and efficient remedy. The evil to be cured is frequently caused by the building of parallel lines of road where none were needed, thus dividing the business below the paying point. Then each of several roads commences cutting rates to secure more than its share of the business, until the rates become nearly nominal and business is done at a loss.

Of course when this process is pursued long enough it becomes a question of the survival of the fittest. One or more roads which were perhaps always weak become insolvent and are placed in the hands of a receiver, but even this catastrophe may not stop a railroad war; the receiver manages the bankrupt road in the interest of the bondholders, and so long as even a small percentage is paid upon them, or if the road will simply pay running expenses, or even if the running nets a small loss, it may continue to be operated for a time. Of course this must end at last or the insolvent road or roads will drag down with them those that up to that time had been in good financial condition. But the process may be long and distressing.

It must be borne in mind that competition does not follow the same rule in industries where there is a large fixed capital that it does in ordinary commercial transactions. In the latter the merchant can stop selling when goods can not be disposed of at a profit, or at the worst without loss. He can wait, expecting that his competitor will soon either fail or weary of selling below cost, and in either case he can resume business profitably. A manufactory or a railroad can not stop without serious loss. The former has a large capital in building and machinery, the latter in its road-bed and equipment, and they each have large numbers of workmen to whom idleness means poverty and distress, and who will seek work elsewhere in case of a stoppage of operations.

The mill or railroad will therefore continue to run beyond the safety-line indicated by the results of competition. This is peculiarly the fact with railroads, because the competition is so direct, and often to a certain extent personal, that it becomes bitter and degenerates into strife. Any arrangement, whatever it may be called, that liberates these waning interests from such a position should be welcomed. It seems to me that the only cure is such a settlement as will secure a fair division of the business and equitable rates of freight. Under such circumstances ultimate combination is inevitable.

A famous railroad authority asserts that where combination is possible competition is impossible. These two antagonistic principles, like all others, may be carried too far, in which event each produces its own peculiar evils. Congress certainly will not insist that destructive competition shall continue to a bitter and disastrous end, and prohibit the use of the only means that can prevent it by a mutual agreement to charge reasonable rates.

The effect of such a law would be to destroy a large proportion of the railroad property of the country and to build upon its ruins a railroad monopoly more odious and oppressive than any we have seen. To prevent such a result I would allow the roads to make such arrangements as would protect their stockholders and would not injure private rights or public interests which are entirely compatible with such arrangements.

The gradual diminution of the rate of charges within a few years to their present low standard proves that this problem is being satisfactorily solved and as rapidly as the most sanguine could expect. That there are evils in railroad management which require correction is unquestionable. These evils should be corrected by some authority which can decide each case upon its merits. This authority could be exercised by a commission appointed by the General Government, which could investigate all charges of unjust discrimination and exorbitant rates and advise the parties of their conclusion. If not acceded to the commission could suggest arbitration, and if this were declined by the offending party could prosecute the delinquent at common law. The commission could also report to Congress facts relating to railroad management and suggestions respecting needed legislation.

The conclusions of this body would be sustained by public opinion, which in our country is sufficiently powerful to compel obedience to its mandates. The decisions of the commissioners would therefore have immediately the force of law, as is proved in my own State by an experience extending over many years. If it should be necessary to appeal to the law, then it would be difficult to enact a code of statutes that would apply to each case as fairly and fully and would result in such exact justice between the parties as an application of the principles of the common law.

This famous system of jurisprudence, whose maxims are derived from and are applicable to an infinite variety of cases, is the result of the accumulated judicial experience and wisdom of many generations. It touches every case like the atmosphere which surrounds us, and is as firm as the foundations of justice; it has long been regarded with respect and even reverence by lawyers and laymen alike—a sentiment which is confirmed by the lapse of time and the accumulating proofs of its wisdom and efficiency.

Having merely indicated my objections to the bill, without attempting to argue them at length, I close with a confession of the extraordinary difficulties of the subject from a legislative point of view and the impropriety of adopting a Procrustean method for the solution of a problem so complex, delicate, and difficult as railway management.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced agreement to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5179) to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I yield for seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, both of the bills pending here, the Senate or Cullom bill providing for a railway commission to regulate railway transportation, and the House or Reagan bill to regulate it by a strict law which is to be enforced by individuals bringing lawsuits at their own expense, contain many wholesome principles and excellent provisions. But the Senate bill is, I think, manifestly the most effective of good, and a vote for it will be the most practical in its results. Both prohibit unreasonable charges, rebates, drawbacks, special rates, and unjust discriminations, and both require the railroads to publish and keep posted the schedules of rates. Both contain the provision prohibiting a higher charge for a long haul than for a shorter haul over the same road. That provision, though it seems fair in words, is one which, unwisely applied, may work great hardship and oppression to the people shipping their products in the Northwest.

The Cullom or Senate bill fortunately gives a discretion to the commission in the application of this harsh provision, and I prefer it greatly on that account. It is the good fortune of the people who live at or near the termination of the long system of water ways extending from the sea to Lake Michigan and at the end of the lines of great competing trunk railways running from New York to Chicago to have, by the double effect of this cheap water transportation in competition with the roads, and by the fact of the trunk lines of roads themselves competing with one another as well as with the propellers and canal-boats in transporting hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of products, to have very low rates comparatively from Chicago to New York—one-third or one-half the ordinary rates charged elsewhere in the United States for railway carriage. In some cases and at certain times the disproportion is greater than this.

Now, at the stations on these trunk lines east of Chicago, and eastward for a long distance, the roads charge local rates on freight going to New York higher than the through rate from Chicago. They take from a station a few car-loads; they take from Chicago ten thousand train-loads, and in the struggle for it with each other and with the water way by the lakes they carry it at the lowest possible point, sometimes at a slight loss. They get a profit from the hundreds of stations paying local rates, and this keeps them running and pays their fixed charges. Even these local rates on the trunk lines are lower than in other parts of the United States. If then by law you absolutely force them to put the local rates down to the through rate, to charge no more for the shorter than for the long haul, or to put up the through rate so that they will not be charging less for a long than for a shorter haul, what will they do? They must keep their roads running; the local rates are the life of the roads; they will, instead of giving them up, raise the through rate.

In a word, this Reagan bill strictly carried out as it is severely drawn, would result in compelling our people in the Northwest to pay local rates on their products going eastward to market. In effect it would stop them from going at all and shut us off from the great markets of the East and Europe, for prices are so low now that if you raise the burden of freight charges to be borne by the farmer's crop he can not send it, can not get any adequate reward for his hard labor. A meddling law, inflexibly enforced, though it may be designed with good intentions, can do incalculable harm.

It is not fair to us, Mr. Speaker, that the advantages of our position, with the lake route and the trunk lines competing for our vast trade at low rates, should be taken away by an arbitrary law. Nature placed the lakes there, and shaped the continent, and marked out the sites of cities and ports and the easy path for the construction of railways. Legislation did not do it for us, and should not interfere to mar the operation of the laws of nature and of trade. I trust this Congress will not attempt by law to compel Western farmers to pay local rates on the enormous crops of the Northwest.

The Cullom bill, it is true, also contains this provision, which seems so fair and plausible, and can do so much harm. But the Cullom bill, while declaring generally that no more shall be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, very prudently and carefully provides that upon application to the commission the road may in special cases be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances. Under that provision the commission can prevent the law from operating unjustly, especially in cases where roads and water ways compete, and a fair commission would not allow the law to be so applied as to raise the freight rates on the region lying at and just west of Chicago. The Reagan bill contains nothing to soften the inflexible strictness of the prohibition applied everywhere, and it would bear heavily on us.

It is a very strong practical reason to my mind for preferring the Senate bill which is to be carried out by a commission, that it is a system that has been tried and works well in Illinois and many other States. It is found to be a good way of practically dealing with cases of oppression by railroads, a prompt, sure means of getting a decision from the courts in spite of all the law's delay that the ablest lawyers may attempt. It is not a system of experiment, but of fact, of experience. In various States in this country, in England, in Belgium, and substantially in France, it has been tried and is in successful operation. The House bill is altogether experiment, and this is too vast a business to experiment with if we can avoid it.

We should aim at results. Voting for the Senate bill and passing it here will secure a law, for it has passed the Senate and will become a law as soon as signed. Voting for the Reagan bill, even passing it here in this House, will have no effect, unless it be political effect, for we all know it will not pass the Senate. That has been tried too often. The people want legislation to regulate railways, want a law, not bills or speeches. They demand that something be actually done that will practically answer their complaints and protect their rights. The Cullom bill is a good one even to the mind of the advocate of the Reagan bill as far as it goes, though he wants it more inflexible in its terms. Let us pass it now, and the people will all prefer this far better than talking, debating, speech-making for years about reform and never reforming.

Both these bills aim at the same thing but by different methods; one is to be enforced by five commissioners at the public expense for the public good; the other by lawsuits brought by individuals against the railroads—a method that people in our region, especially poor men, do not feel encouraged by their experience to undertake.

The Cullom bill enables the poorest man, the tenant as easily as the rich farmer or mercantile house, to present his complaint in a plain way and if he has a fair case to set in motion all of the machinery of the courts with able counsel and without any expense or risk to himself, and secure redress for his wrongs as quickly and completely as the richest. Under the Reagan bill he must take the risk of a lawsuit, that may wear him out and beggar him of what little he had. Is it likely that such men will readily try such a contest? Is it not more likely that these severe provisions of law will be abused by rival interests, rich and powerful, to foment and instigate lawsuits to harass competitors, and the law merely made an instrument in the struggles of the strong to weaken and exhaust the weaker roads?

There is a softening discretion allowed to the commissioners by the Cullom bill, and it is the better for it. I have pointed out a striking and beneficial instance where it deeply affects the people of my own district. How much better this is than to fix in advance by inflexible law the whole body of rules to govern the most complex business known to our civilization and the most extensive, involving the largest amount of property and the greatest number of individual interests in the whole world. It is well to have five wise, able, experienced men of reputation, commanding general confidence, clothed with a limited discretion in applying and enforcing a law that touches every man and every interest so closely.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I now yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bill (H. R. 6337) for the relief of James D. Wood; when the Speaker signed the same.

WOMEN'S NATIONAL PRESS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the front seat to the right of the reporters' gallery, and in the gallery now set apart for the use of ladies, be and is hereby set apart for the exclusive use of the Women's National Press Association, subject to the conditions and regulations of the rules established by the Committee on Rules.

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 21, 1886.

I hereby desiginate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session this evening under its special order, for debate only, upon the bill that was under consideration at the hour when the House took a recess, the bill to regulate commerce.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the agitation of the question of the control of railroads, whether by State or national authority, has since its origin developed a wonderful change in the opinion of not only the general public but the railroads themselves. In many and I believe all of the States every proposition, whether of control by commissioners or statute, was fought by the roads in the press, at the polls, or in the courts. W. P. Shinn, in an article on the "relations of railways to the State," published in the Railway Review in March of this year, says:

The leading railroad companies, which formerly opposed such a commission are now almost without an exception in its favor; not because, as has been charged, they expect to be able to control it, but because it places between the companies and the public a responsible organization to which both parties can appeal and in the decisions of which both will acquiesce. It substitutes the forum for the public prints in the trial of cases of complaint; and all experience goes to show that under the light of investigation nine-tenths of the complaints made fail of substantiation, and thus grave causes of friction are removed.

In the discussion of this measure before the Commerce Committee of this Congress there was, as I recollect, only one man, and he was from Tennessee, who lagged behind the procession and stood out against the regulation either by the Reagan bill or a commission. For years nothing was heard but an appeal to supposed self-regulating laws of trade and competition, which were alone to be relied on for the regulation of reasonableness of charges and the prevention of unjust discriminations. While not denying in terms the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, it was denied that Congress had the right to control the common carrier or to control the commerce passing between the States.

Mr. Sellers said before Commerce Committee, Forty-eighth Congress:

If you have followed my remarks I have said, for the transportation of goods and persons, for the regulation of the charges of a common carrier on land highways there is no direct power in Congress; that is wholly in the States.

Near the same time that these arguments were being made here able railroad attorneys were insisting before Judges Baxter, Hammond, and Key, in the Federal court at Nashville, that a law creating a railroad commission for the State of Tennessee to regulate rates in the State was void and a violation of the Constitution of the United States, because it was a regulation of commerce between the States.

The argument prevailed with the court, notwithstanding the undoubted fact that that act by its terms dealt alone with rates inside the State of Tennessee, and its findings as to rates were not conclusive on the companies, but only prima facie correct, in any trial resulting from misunderstandings or differences with them.

Mr. Fink, the ablest railroad expert perhaps in the country, stated the position to be that:

All business belongs to the railroads that they can get at some profit. If it pays you little, you take little, rather than nothing; that is the principle recognized in all commercial transactions; every merchant that sells goods, sells calicoes or other cheap goods at a low profit, or even less than he paid for them, and sells silks at a larger profit to make up for the loss on the cheaper goods.

Mr. Charles E. Perkins, president of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, in a letter to the chairman of the select committee of the Senate, says:

Railroads may be said to manufacture a commodity for sale, namely, transportation. * * * They [the railroads] should stand on precisely the same ground as that occupied by other commercial ventures.

* * * * * * *

Charging a lower rate for a long haul than for a short haul, or making concessions to large shippers as against small shippers is really doing business at wholesale instead of retail. And the attempt has often been made to show that it is unjust discrimination. All trade is full of injustice in this sense. A man who buys anything in small quantities pays more than one who buys at wholesale. * * * It is expedient that shippers and carriers should be left free to make their own bargains. Society should treat railroad transportation as commerce nd let prices alone.

In short, the position taken by the railroad management is summed up in the report of the select committee of the Senate on interstate commerce as follows (page 183):

A railroad corporation has been looked upon by its managers as an association of individuals engaged in furnishing and selling of transportation for their own advantage and free to conduct the business in their own way as individual mercantile enterprises are conducted.

This position is utterly irreconcilable with the legal status of these corporations as common carriers. The common law since the time of Sir Matthew Hale has fixed and determined the character and obligations of those who exercise the business of carrying as a public employment.

The carrier may stipulate what his freight charges and fares shall be, but the law imposes the obligation that they shall be reasonable and not extortionate. Hence, he in fact does not fix the amount charged. He can only charge what is reasonable, and the law fixes that.

I would not, however, have it understood—

Says Lord Mansfield—

that carriers are at liberty by law to charge whatever they please; a carrier is liable by law to carry everything that is brought to him for a reasonable sum to be paid for the same carriage, and not to extort what he will.

This is the law to-day. (Redfield, 95; 12 Wallace, 270.)

Chief-Justice Taney, in 5 Howard, 583, says common carriers exercise a sort of public office and have duties to perform in which the public is interested.

The Supreme Court of the United States has announced the law authoritatively in this matter.

In Munn vs. Illinois (4 Otto), the court say:

The very essence of government has found expression in the maxim "Sic utere ut alienum non lædas." From this source came the police powers, which, as was said by Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the license cases (5 How., 583), "are nothing more nor less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty, * * * that is to say * * * the power to govern men and things.

Under these powers the Government regulates the conduct of its citizens one toward another, and the manner in which each shall use his own property, when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good. In their exercise it has been customary from time immemorial in England, and in this country from its first colonization, to regulate ferries, common carries, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, inn-keepers, &c., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodation furnished, and articles sold.

This brings us to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what is without its operative effect. Looking then to the common law, from whence came the right which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is "affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only." This was said by Lord Chief-Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago in his treatise De partibus marts (I Harg. Law Tracts 78), and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property.

Property does become clothed with a public interest, when used in a manner to make it of public consequence, and affect the community at large.

When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest he in effect grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public, for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but so long as he maintains the use he must submit to the control.

Common carriers exercise a sort of public office, and have duties to perform in which the public is interested. Their business is, therefore, affected with a public interest within the meaning of the doctrine Lord Hale has so forcibly stated. But we need go no further. Enough has already been said to show that when private property is devoted to public use it is subject to public regulation.

We know that this is a power which may be abused; but that is no argument against its existence. For protection against abuses by Legislatures the people must resort to the polls, not to the courts.

Not only is it true that railroads are subject to regulation and control by law as common carriers in a business affected by a public use, but they are also public highways. It is true that they are to be used in a particular way, but they are nevertheless highways, and as such subject to control.

The Supreme Court of the United States says:

"That railroads, though constructed by private corporations and owned by them, are public highways has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Whether the use of a railroad is a public or a private one depends in no measure upon the question who constructed and owns it. It has never been considered a matter of any importance that the road was built by the agency of a private corporation. No matter who is the agent, the action performed is that of the State. Though the ownership is private, the use is public. So turnpikes, bridges, ferries, and canals, although made by individuals under public grants, or by companies, are regarded as publici juris.

The right to exact tolls or charge freights is granted for a service to the public. The owners may be private companies, but they are compelled to permit the public to use their works in the manner in which such works can be used.

It is said that railroads are not public highways per se; that they are only declared such by the decision of the courts, and that they have been declared public only with respect to the power of eminent domain. This is a mistake. In their very nature they are highways. It needed no decision of the court to make them such. (16 Wallace, 694-6.)

It follows that these corporations are thus on two distinct grounds indubitably the subjects of the control of Congress, under its grant of power to regulate commerce among the States. And in asserting and exercising the right to tax traffic between the States all it will bear the railroads have in effect usurped the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

In support of their discriminations against persons and localities they are forced to claim to be merchants, and every argument offered in support of their right to sell transportation at such rates as they deem proper is in derogation of the common law and destructive of the rights of the public, who are bound to avail themselves of their facilities for transportation. In the face of decision after decision of the courts they still assert, as we have seen, that it is impossible to subject them to control as common carriers on a public highway without destroying their property and contract rights.

Mr. Justice Johnson, in Gibbons vs. Ogden (9 Wheaton), says:

Commerce, in its simplest signification, means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and the various mediums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation.

In the Reading Railroad Company vs. Pennsylvania (15 Wallace) the court held that—

Beyond all question the transportation of freights or of the subjects of commerce for the purpose of exchange or sale is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States.

In Mobile vs. Kimball (102 U. S.) the power of Congress to regulate commerce is declared "to be without limitation. It authorizes Congress to prescribe the conditions upon which commerce in all its forms shall be conducted." * * * It is under an act of Congress that the railroads chartered by the different States connect with the roads of other States so as to form continuous lines. (Act of July 15, 1866.) In the absence of Congressional action in this matter the railroads have attempted to regulate the commerce of the country in their own way, and still shrink from Congressional control. In the report of the Select Committee of the Senate on Interstate Commerce the indictment against them is drawn by no unfriendly hand and upon a full and patient investigation and survey of the whole field.

And I read this in extenso, because it has been stated here by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that the complaints against the railroads were unfounded—that the beneficent management of the roads had taken the ground from under every objector. The indictment consists of eighteen counts, as follows:

THE CAUSES OF COMPLAINT AGAINST THE RAILROAD SYSTEM.

The complaints against the railroad system of the United States expressed to the committee are based upon the following charges:

1. That local rates are unreasonably high compared with through rates.
2. That both local and through rates are unreasonably high at non-competing points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling agreements that restrict its operation.
3. That rates are established without apparent regard to the actual cost of the service performed, and are based largely on "what the traffic will bear."
4. That unjustifiable discriminations are constantly made between individuals in the rates charged for like service under similar circumstances.
5. That improper discriminations are made between articles of freight and branches of business of a like character, and between different quantities of the same class of freight.
6. That unreasonable discriminations are made between localities similarly situated.
7. That the effect of the prevailing policy of railroad management is, by an elaborate system of secret special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions, to foster monopoly, to enrich favored shippers, and to prevent free competition in many lines of trade in which the item of transportation is an important factor.
8. That such favoritism and secrecy introduce an element of uncertainty into legitimate business that greatly retards the development of our industries and commerce.
9. That the secret cutting of rates and the sudden fluctuations that constantly take place are demoralizing to all business except that of a purely speculative character, and frequently occasion great injustice and heavy losses.
10. That, in the absence of national and uniform legislation, the railroads are able by various devices to avoid their responsibility as carriers, especially on shipments over more than one road, or from one State to another, and that shippers find great difficulty in recovering damages for the loss of property or for injury thereto.
11. That railroads refuse to be bound by their own contracts, and arbitrarily collect large sums in the shape of overcharges in addition to the rates agreed upon at the time of shipment.
12. That railroads often refuse to recognize or be responsible for the acts of dishonest agents acting under their authority.
13. That the common law fails to afford a remedy for such grievances, and that in cases of dispute the shipper is compelled to submit to the decision of the railroad manager or pool commissioner, or run the risk of incurring further losses by greater discriminations.
14. That the differences in the classifications in use in various parts of the country, and sometimes for shipments over the same roads in different directions, are a fruitful source of misunderstandings, and are often made a means of extortion.
15. That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.
16. That the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceed the actual cost of their construction or their present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued.
17. That railroad corporations have improperly engaged in lines of business entirely distinct from that of transportation, and that undue advantages have been afforded to business enterprises in which railroad officials were interested.
18. That the management of the railroad business is extravagant and wasteful, and that a needless tax is imposed upon the shipping and traveling public by the unnecessary expenditure of large sums in the maintenance of a costly force of agents engaged in a reckless strife for competitive business.

Mr. William P. Shinn, in the Railway Review, before quoted, says:

Until recently the railroad companies have been hostile to and have earnestly opposed all legislation upon the subject of regulation of interstate transportation by the Government, but it is now being recognized by the most enlightened railroad officials that such legislation is necessary, proper, and desirable.

The rate wars which have of late years so devastated the finances of railroad companies are all inaugurated and carried on upon interstate traffic. They are detrimental alike to producer, transporter, and consumer; they introduce elements of chance in transactions of business which should rest entirely upon supply and demand; they encourage speculation in the staples of life, and are generally to be deplored.

Such is the power in the large corporations intrusted to one man, who may exercise it from personal cupidity or for private revenge as well as from laudable motives, in the interest of his corporation, that only the General Government, which can control all, can afford any remedy or relief.

Upon the other hand, producers and shippers find themselves shut out of their legitimate markets because some more favored shipper or locality is secretly given rates so much lower as to enable the latter to monopolize the traffic, while the former has only recourse to the courts, always slow and frequently uncertain.

In the interest of producer, transporter, and consumer, governmental regulation of interstate traffic is necessary and desirable.

This is a confession written by a friend of railroads. They have failed to regulate or govern in this field, which they invaded and held by usurpation or the failure of Congress to assert its control. But they say you must not regulate us by statute. The common law and State statutes declaratory of the common law have failed to give relief. Why is this so? Because under the existing system the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish that the rate is unreasonable or the discrimination unjust, and the sources of information upon these issues are in the hands of and under the control of the defendant, locked up in his books and in the memory of his agents and his experts.

Hence the hesitation of a man solitary and alone to sue a great corporation and endure the "law's delay and insolence of office" in the vain effort to obtain redress for the countless wrongs included in the Senate's bill of indictment and the confession of friends.

And when a law is proposed like the Reagan bill, declaring what is right and prohibiting what is wrong; opening the courts of the venue of supposed wrongs; providing for access to books and papers of the railroad corporations remedying as far as may be those things which have rendered the common-law remedies up to this date ineffectual and useless, the railroads exhaust themselves with rage and exclamation and implore the Congress of the United States to enact for their benefit a special-class legislation in the shape of a commissioner to stand between them and justice, to legalize their pooling and their unjust discriminations and their iniquitous loading of their short-haul customers with the shortcomings of the long-haul, or the robbery of intermediate people to make good the loss of reckless competitive efforts to overreach or destroy rivals at competitive terminal points.

Where is the constitutional delicacy or chartered sacredness of these great corporations that they should not submit to the rule of the principles of the common law whether by the courts or by a commission? They have been the pets of States, the receivers of prodigal bounty! National and State aid have been given without stint. Bonds have been showered along their track like "leaves in Valombrosa." They have been armed with the State's right of eminent domain and her writ ad quod damnum to condemn private property to their use upon payment of just compensation. They were inaugurated with the shouts of a generous people, and sustained in their splendid success in developing and building up the country; but by reckless disregard of popular and legal rights and their obligations as common carriers they have come under the ban of a majority of the whole people of the country.

Like prodigals they have thrown away the good opinion of their benefactors, the people. The Senate committee says, page 191: "Universal complaint has been made to the committee as to the discriminations commonly practiced against places and as to the conspicuous discrepancies between what are usually termed 'local' rates and what are known as 'through' rates."

Are the American people engaged in one universal conspiracy against the poor innocent and persecuted railroads? No, Mr. Speaker. What everybody that knows you says about you is true. But our friends of the minority are alarmed for the railroads, and deprecate the laying down of any "cast-iron" rules for the regulation of this enormous traffic, "unless it should be interfered with and its prosperity vitally affected." No man in America wishes to harm these roads. But as Rufus Choate long since said, the "railroads were made for the people, not the people for the railroads."

The gentlemen want india-rubber rules for these monopolies. Seeing that they must give up their coveted domination over every interest in their own selfish and ungrateful abuse of power, seeing that the control of interstate commerce in the interest of the people was to come, in some shape, they with wily stratagem "stooped to conquer." The cry that they will be ruined is the cry of a spoiled child or a selfish tyrant who sees his sway overcome and controlled by a power for the right.

It would be singular if in this new field of legislation any law could be passed that would be perfect. England has passed many hundred statutes in the abortive attempt to regulate these matters, and the greatest failure of all the thirty-three hundred has been her commission.

Gentlemen laud the railroad commission in England, laud it in Belgium, laud it everywhere. Let us see what Mr. Hadley, in his work on Railroad Transportation, says on the subject:

We have seen what were the events which led to the passage of the regulation of railways act in 1873. The commission appointed under that act was to consist of three members; one of them a railroad man, one a lawyer. They received a salary of £3,000 each. They were to decide all questions arising under the act of 1854, and subsequent acts connected with it. They were further empowered to arbitrate betweenrailroads in a variety of cases; to compel companies to make through rates which should conform to the intention of the act of 1854; to secure publicity of rates; to decide what constitutes a proper terminal charge, and some other less important matters. On questions of fact their decision was to be final; on questions of law it was to be subject to appeal. The railway commissioners themselves were to determine what were questions of fact and what were questions of law. Subsequent acts have made but slight changes in these powers.

The commission consisted of able men—Sir Frederick Peel, Mr. Price, formerly of the Midland Railway, and Mr. Macnamara; the last named died in 1877 and was succeeded by Mr. A. E. Miller. They went to work with energy, and in a spirit which promised to make the experiment a signal success. And it was at first supposed to be such a success. People judged by the reports of the commission itself; and they were the more prone to believe the reports because it was so desirable to find an easy solution of perplexing questions of railroad policy. Mr. Adams, writing in 1878, said, "The mere fact that the tribunal is there; that a machinery does exist for the prompt and final decision of that class of questions, puts an end to them. They no longer exist." That represented the general public opinion on the subject at the time; it represents the general impression in America down to the present time.

In 1878, the very year when Mr. Adams wrote, the original term of the commission expired. People supposed that it would be made permanent. Instead of that the renewals have been for much shorter periods, leaving the commissioners a precarious tenure, and showing dissatisfaction somewhere.

A parliamentary investigation on railroad rates in 1881-'82 showed the grounds of dissatisfaction only too clearly. The testimony revealed a state of things almost unsuspected by the general public, and giving an entirely different explanation of the fact that the commissioners had so few cases to deal with. The substance is that the power of the commission satisfies nobody. It has power enough to annoy the railroads, and not power enough to help the public efficiently.

The railway commission was a court, not an executive body, but to all intents and purposes a court of law. And in establishing this new court, in addition to those already existing, Parliament had two ends in view: (1) to have a tribunal which would and could act when others would or could not. (2) To avoid the expense, delay, and vexation incident to litigation under the old system. Neither end was well fulfilled.

(1) The commission could not act, partly from want of jurisdiction, partly from want of executive power. Its jurisdiction did not cover by any means the whole ground. The provisions about terminals, arbitration, working agreements, &c., amounted to very little. Its real power was under the act of 1854. It could under this act require companies to furnish "proper facilities," and it could prevent their giving "preferences." But it could not compel a company to comply with special acts or special provisions of its charter. This is a serious difficulty, because the question of proper facilities was closely connected with charter requirements, and the railroad could almost anywhere raise the point of want of jurisdiction.

Nor could it enforce its decrees. Passive resistance of the railroads and jealousy on the part of the old established courts combined to produce this effect. For instance, under the act of 1854, if the railways refused to comply with the decisions of the court of common pleas, they were liable to a fine of $1,000 for every day's delay. The London, Chatham and Dover Railway refused to comply with one of the commission's decisions, and claimed that they were not liable to any such fine, although all the powers of the court of common pleas, under the act of 1854, had been transferred to the railway commission by the act of 1873. The court of exchequer actually sustained the railroad; and it was not until 1878 that by a decision of the Queen's bench the railway commission really had the power to do anything if a company chose to disregard its orders.

The injunctions of the commission at best only affect the future; for any remedy for the past there must be a new complaint and trial before a regular court. And so it often happens that a railroad, after exhausting all its means of resistance, obeys the decision of the commission in reference to one particular station without taking any notice of it at other stations where the same principle is involved. Thus, in the case of the manure traffic of Aberdeen, after long litigation, the rate was decided to be illegal. The railroad then reduced its Aberdeen rates, but continued its old schedule of charges at other points on its route where there were not organized interests strong enough to make a fight.

On the face of the act of 1873 the decisions of the commission, as to what were questions of fact or questions of law, appeared to be final. But by writ of mandamus from a court of appeal the decision on this point could be at once taken out of the hands of the commission by compelling them "to state a case," which could then be made the subject of action in the higher court. So this important power was made of no effect.

(2) Complaints before the commission are not quite so slow or costly as they were before the courts, but they are bad enough to prevent most men from undertaking them. Sir Frederick Peel himself admits that the expense frightens people away from making complaints. But this is by no means the worst. The testimony before the Parliamentary committee of 1881-'82 is full of matter to startle those who argue that because there are few complaints before the commission there are few men that have grievances. Men have good reason to think twice before they enter a complaint.

In the Aberdeen manure case, already referred to, the Aberdeen men, successful at every point, lost more money than they gained. Every important case is so persistently appealed that the original promptness or cheapness of railway commission practice counts for nothing. But the indirect results are yet worse. A complainant is a marked man, and the commission can not protect him against the vengeance of the railroads.

The railroads know that if they can not control the commission the chances are that it will be a greater failure here than in England. Upon the commissioners here in Washington will be focalized the headlights of all the railroads in the Union, with their command over the facts, and their expert knowledge, and without indulging in degrading suspicions of the venality of men, it would be next to impossible for such a tribunal not to be unduly influenced by the superior skill of fence and facility of massing facts upon them that the railroads would possess. But, if these conclusions are not warranted, certainly a commission would be onerated with the almost impossible task of taking care of and deciding justly all the disputes of a country whose area is many times that of Great Britain.

We have invested in railroads £1,190,000,000 to Great Britain's £770,000,000. How would it be possible for an individual or an obscure and remote town to come hundreds and thousands of miles to this city for redress. And then, when would the decrees of this commission ever be enforced? All the power, money, and skill of the combined railroad wealth would be exerted to delay and defeat any obnoxious finding.

The minority in their report oppose the prohibiting of drawbacks or rebates. They are not in favor of the provision against greater charge for the short haul than the long. They "differ from the majority as to pooling," believing its "absolute prohibition is unnecessary," and extol the past experience in railway transportation which proves the pool to be the nearest (sic) and fairest device yet used to place shippers on an equality." They approach the subject of publicity of rates as if they trod on eggs, and whisper "that a carefully digested section might be incorporated in the law to meet this point," and after all suggest a commission. What is the use of anything from this minority report? It negatives the Senate report and turns it back and shuts its eyes on the facts there arrayed in support of the terrible charges contained in the indictment they prefer against railroad mismanagement, discriminations and oppression.

SHORT HAUL AND LONG HAUL.

It is said that the short and long haul clause of the bill will result in driving the railroads to devoting their attention to local rates and refuse through freights; that this will cut the great interests of the West off from markets, or increase the through-freight rates. Except in rate wars it is a mistake to say that railroads carry through freights at less than cost of transportation. Competition simply reduces the profit on through rates to the minimum, when competition is not superseded by combination, and it is a gross misstatement to say that the railroads now carry through long-haul freights at less than cost of transportation. It is said to justify extorting from intermediate points more than is just; or, in other words, railroads justify extortion on local rates by alleging it is necessary to pay for cut-throat competition wars on through rates. As to the proviso to exempt any railroad from the long and short haul section the Louisville Courier-Journal, which, as I understand it, is opposed to control of railroads by the Reagan or Cullom bill, says:

This section, however, is murdered without clergy by the proviso which puts it within the power of the proposed railroad commission to exempt any railroad whatever from the control of the whole long and short haul section. This proviso would obviously give the commission the license of a despotic and irresponsible junto, to make and unmake profits for any line whatever, to establish discrimination ruinous to railroads, cities, and agricultural communities, and to levy blackmail or booty on a gigantic scale upon any railroad or water carrier in the United States. It would, in fact, operate to place the commerce of all sections of the country under the mercy and subject to the rapacity or the whims of a solitary central junto, and might also be thus established in control of the stock market. It would seem that this fatal addition to the bill must have been foisted upon it by some of its enemies.

It is no reckless experiment to go to the perfection of human reason, the common law, under which every other interest has prospered, under which the glorious plant of Anglo-Saxon liberty and law has grown and flourished time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, to try and make effective its time-honored principles for the protection of the people against the tyranny and rivalry of giant corporations. But the question at last is, shall the principles of the common law be applied to the railroads by a commission or the courts?

For every provision which means in good faith to regulate interstate commerce in the Cullom bill is a common-law principle.

And I say, in the light of all the facts, if the Cullom bill can be made to include by amendment in conference some of the vital features of the Reagan bill and be shorn of its power of discrimination and distinction—of the power to make or break its favorites or its enemies—I will vote for it, as a step in advance of anything in the past Congressional history of the friends of railroads and as the beginning of a system which experience and the dicta of courts may mold, modify, and perfect; which may control with equal hand the interests and rights of carrier and shipper, and conserve the prosperity and common weal of all. This can be done if the advocates of that bill are in earnest, and if it is not a Trojan horse and a deception.

Law is not a revelation. Its tables are no longer handed down from the cloud on the mount. Law is a growth. Legislative power originates a rule of action, the courts pass upon it, experience tests it. From failure comes the successful statute thus planted, pruned, and reared into growth. Where can you get a more healthy and approved stock upon which to ingraft the new growth requisite for our new wants if not in the common law? Its protection against extortion and unjust discrimination in common carriers proved effectual until the age of steam.

The living principle of justice is in it; all it needs is to be set free. It is neither old nor blind, and if allowed to use its strength will rend the jaws of the lion of monopoly and unjust discrimination. The interposition of a commission is to be between the people and the courts—is a subtle device to close the courts against them. Our bill of rights says they shall be and remain open. Who are these intruders who deny to the humblest citizen his legal remedy, and dispute his right to justice without sale, denial, or delay?

It is a plea born of cowardice and tyranny. No harm can come to railroads by being compelled to do right. Disaster, public mistrust, and enmity have resulted from their own control. Railroad wreckers have grown rich on the spoils plundered from States and stockholders. The arrogance of tyrannical corporations has produced riot and bloodshed, and misery to mechanics, and poverty and bankruptcy to farmers.

As soon as the courts are armed with a live statute the gathered storm of popular indignation will be dissipated and the corporations will assume an attitude toward the community and the law-making power different from that which they now maintain.

Talk about prejudice against railroads! No man wishes to harm them, no man denies that they are most powerful factors in our prosperity, no man would disturb any vested right that is not exercised to strike down popular rights.

If they have been imprudently vested by charter with the right to fix their own rates to the detriment of the public prosperity it is a grant of the power to govern, which no Legislature had the right to make. No Legislature can contract away the discretion of their successors as to matters of government. Neither the power to govern, the power to preserve public health nor morals can be bargained away by contract or charter.

These corporations have fought this fight long and bitterly. For ten years they have succeeded in defeating Congressional control. They may succeed now in interposing a commission which as "silence like a poultice comes to heal the wounds of sound;" but the determination for legal control of these matters as evinced by the legislation of so many States and the utterances of the courts all over this broad land will not be satisfied until just restraint is placed upon the abuse of licentious and unbridled corparate power. [Great applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman reserve his remaining time?

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir; I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL].

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, though a member of the Committee on Commerce, and a supporter of this bill in committee, I am reluctant to trouble the House with any remarks of mine. In the last Congress I listened with attention to all that was said upon the important question of the regulation of interstate commerce.

I became convinced that Congress not only had the constitutional power, but that it was impelled by a public duty, to pass a bill similar to the one now under discussion, and I then voted for the bill known as the Reagan bill, which passed this body but failed of passage in the other branch of Congress.

Reflection and study since have only strengthened me in the opinions I then formed.

But still with these opinions firmly fixed, I would not trespass upon time with which each day is becoming more and more precious and when, in my judgment, there should be less talk and more work, but for the fact that I come from the great agricultural center of Virginia, where my ears catch at all times the complaints of my constituents of the discrimination, extortion, and oppression of railroad corporations.

At the very threshhold of my remarks, however, I want to say that I am not of that number who are always ready to engage in idle clamor against railroad monopolies. I believe railroads have in great measure made this country what it is, the admiration and wonder of the world. I have no sympathy with that cheap demagogy which is ever ready to pander to ignorant prejudices by denouncing as monsters all who may be prominent in the management of these important factors in the progress and civilization of this country. No man favors them more than I do; no hand is more ready to aid them in every legitimate way, and no voice will be raised quicker in their defense, when wronged, than mine.

I would protect them in all their legal rights and render unto them the same justice I would measure out unto private individuals under similar circumstances. While they, like all corporations, might be "soulless," I would not be soulless; while they might have no heart to beat in the cause of right, I would have a heart to feel for their rights; while they might oppress, I would stay my hand in retaliation; while, like the horse-leech, their cry might be "give! give! give!" and, like the grave, their call "more! more! more!" I would demand simply that they be kept within the bounds of reason, the scope of justice, and the limits of purpose for which they were created.

In a word, sir, they are in the intendment of the law the servants and not the masters of the people, and I would act toward them in that fair, just, and equitable manner that should characterize the treatment of a servant, and in return demand of them that consideration due from a servant.

When a railroad company secures a charter granting the right to run whither it pleases and to invade private rights at pleasure, it is upon the well-recognized principle that private rights must be subordinated to public interests, and that the construction of the road is for the benefit of the people at large. It is not a private enterprise that is authorized but a public benefit, and whenever it ceases to be a public benefit or so acts as to oppress or discriminate, the object for the attainment of which the legislative power of eminent domain was invoked is thwarted, and private rights have been invaded for private interests and a public benefactor has become a public oppressor.

The exercise of eminent domain inherent in the States, by which life was breathed into the corporations which run and operate the vast network of railroads spreading over the States and Territories, was based upon this principle and no other.

It has been claimed, however, that States have no power even over railroads within their limits to redress the wrongs resulting from the ignoring of this principle, that you must look to and be restricted by the charters. Without stopping to discuss this question it is admitted that the States can not regulate in any way a system of railway running through various States or from one State into another, and that if the power to so regulate exists at all it is in the Congress of the United States.

Some deny that this power is vested in Congress. In other words, they deny that, however grievous may be the wrongs, however great may be the oppression, however outrageous the discrimination, however unconscionable the extortion, there is no remedy, and the people must grin and bear it; that though created for the public good, breathed into life by the sovereign will of the several States for public benefit, these corporations can act as they please and do as they please in the regulation of their rates and the running of their roads.

It seems to me that the mere statement of the proposition is an answer to it. To admit the correctness of it is to admit that under the sanction of law the people of this land can be put under the wheel of machinery whose motion was given to it by the hand of the law. To admit the correctness of it is to admit that this Government, which is claimed to embody all that is good in the recorded experience of all the republics of earth, is unequal to the task of protecting her own citizens against outrage and wrong. Yes, railroad corporations, gentlemen, are to be a law unto themselves; they are to stand out by statutes or the Constitution and with brazen effrontery declare that their will shall be the rule of action all along their tortuous ways.

Sir, I have too high a regard for the strength and scope of that instrument—the Constitution of the United States, the greatest of all instruments, not the result of inspired wisdom—to believe that within its clauses can not be found authority to seize hold of these iron creatures of the law and command them to have at least some respect for the golden rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I have said there are some who deny the power of Congress over this subject, that number is now small and day by day, under the enlightened discussions here and in the public press, is becoming smaller and smaller. I feel, therefore, that it would be a useless consumption of time for me to enter upon a discussion of this constitutional question. In the last Congress there were two bills presented to this House—one by the Committee on Commerce, the other as a substitute by the distinguished chairman then and now of that committee. Both bills recognized the power of the legislative branch of the Government to regulate interstate commerce by prescribing rules and guarding against wrong.

I shall treat it as a settled question and pass to the discussion of the bill presented for the consideration of this body by the Committee on Commerce, and in doing so I shall take the sections seriatim.

NO PERSONAL DISCRIMINATION.

The first section provides that no discrimination shall be made by any railroad in favor of one person over another in rates, facilities of transportation, receiving, delivering, storing, and handling of like property. Can there be any objection to this? In acquiring its franchises for the public good the implication at once arises that all were to be treated alike; that there were to be no preferred classes, no favored few; that the ægis of "equal rights to all, special privileges to none," was to shield against discrimination.

In the great community of interests, in the vast body of citizenship, all stood upon the same broad platform of equal rights; when the power of eminent domain was invaded, and when it was exercised this inherent principle was not destroyed, but remained indelibly written upon the tablets of a free and equal people.

Is it not right? Pray tell me wherein any principle of constitutional, common, statute, divine, or moral law is violated? An individual in his daily private business may discriminate in favor of one neighbor against another; communities may discriminate against each other; nations may discriminate against nations, and justify it upon grounds of peculiar obligations, wrongs real or fancied, public policy, or expediency. But what can justify a corporation, which springs into life by the touch of the sovereign hand, in discriminating against a portion of the community for whose equal benefit that life was given?

This section declares that A shall not be charged more than B, and that he shall have the same facilities and accommodations. It declares that the poor and humble shall enjoy the same privileges and receive the same treatment as the rich and influential. It declares that the small shipper sending perhaps his single car-load, representing the anxiety and anguish it may be of unrequited labor, shall send his little upon the same terms in all respects as the large shipper, with his long train loaded with the products of his wealth, shall send his much. Where is the soul that has a heart to beat for the right who will declare that wealth shall enjoy privileges over poverty on these lines of common carriers, or that influence shall reign supreme and humility bow in the dust?

This section further provides that all charges for transportation, receiving, delivering, storage, and handling shall be reasonable. It also provides that "no break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being treated as one continuous carriage in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage, or to evade any of the provisions of the act."

POOLING PROHIBITED.

The second section prohibits "pooling."

I suppose, sir, there is no provision of this important bill more important and which is more strenuously objected to by the railroads than this provision.

What is pooling? It is a system of combinations by which a number of smaller corporations can make one great and gigantic corporation, which thereby intrenches itself against the effects of competition or the possibility of reasonable rates. It is a system which draws into its capacious maw the highest rates it can obtain by presenting a monopoly from whose extortion the business interests of the community can not escape. It is a system which sounds the death-knell to reasonable rates and raises the standard of monopolistic oppression.

The formation of such a combination is in itself an acknowledgment that its purpose is to deprive the people of the benefits that flow to them from competition and to form a "ring" or make a "corner" on rates.

When a charter is sought to build a railroad parallel to or crossing another, one of the potent arguments always used is the advantages which the sections through which the proposed road may pass will derive from competition. Then, when the charter is granted, the agents pass through the country urging the people to liberality in granting the right of way, without money and without cost, and with a voice as enticing as that of the siren they present the immense advantages to be derived from competition. Rights of way through valuable lands and special privileges are donated, and with eagerness and anxiety the donors await the dawning of a brighter day when their donations are to return to them like bread cast upon the waters.

But, alas! when the road is completed they realize that vain, indeed, are the representations or promises of corporations and that as Dead Sea fruit turns to ashes upon the lips, so the promised blessings vanish into ether. They find that instead of competition they have monopoly; instead of reasonable rates, extortion; instead of similar treatment, discrimination; and they awaken to the fact that they and their interests are in the anaconda coils of a thing without soul or conscience.

This, sir, may be strong language, but it is no stronger than the facts justify. There is no gentleman within the sound of my voice who has not seen or heard of just such occurrences as I have stated. They are read of all men and stand out in blazing light along the line of every railroad constructed as a competing road with some other.

Morality condemns "corners" on the necessary commodities of life, and morality condemns "corners" on railroad rates by which the producers of our land are forced to pay exorbitantly and submit to oppression or allow their products to remain in their garners or rot in their fields, their obligations go to protest, and their credit suffer. Combinations are generally odious, for they usually smack of conspiracy, and the combinations of Wall street whereby fortunes vanish in a day, and the conspirators rush heedlessly over wrecks and ruins, only meet with sanction in the gambling world. But these combinations are made by men who occupy no such relation to the public as do railroad corporations; they are individuals bent on private gain, owing no public duty.

Railroad corporations are public servants, created by the public will and owing a public duty, and when they enter into a conspiracy to "pool" their rates and extort from the sweat and toil of those who in the furrow, in the mines, or at the bench seek to reap a reward for honest exertion, they are perpetrating a wrong at which the wrongs of Wall street drop into insignificance. Sir, enlightened public sentiment condemns "pooling." The law of many States has put the seal of its condemnation upon it, not by statutes only, but I believe by constitutions.

I think the voice of the people has been heard and the decree of the people has been recorded in the clauses of the constitutions of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, and Texas—no less than nine sovereign States have prohibited pooling by their constitutions, and I shall assume that the decrees of these States will be recognized by their representatives here when they shall cast their votes.

Concluding upon this second section, I must express the confident belief that it will be adopted and pooling prohibited.

NO REBATE OR DRAWBACK ALLOWED.

I shall pass now to the third section, which declares "that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered."

What is a rebate?

It is an abatement upon the regular rates.

What is a drawback?

It is a return or paying back of part of the regular rates.

What can be the object of a railroad company in abating or paying back?

If its regular rates are too high, why not reduce them?

It is a secret way, sir, of making fish of one and flesh of another; it is a covert way of discriminating between shippers and having its favored few.

Discrimination is the definition, and advantage to those within the charmed circle the result.

This section, true to the general scope of the bill, plucks this wrong up by the roots. The poor man with no influential surroundings, no influence at headquarters, is placed on the same level with him who has the ear of the magnates; the farmer who is following his plow "from early morn till dewy eve" or driving his team amid the winter cold or summer heat, thinking not of how to drive a sharp bargain or curry favor, is to be protected by the law of his land against the advantage heretofore secured by the shrewd, keen, and calculating shipper who may live more by his wits than his labor. This principle, sparkling with even-handed justice, has been approved by the organic law of Arkansas, California, and Georgia, and I believe by the iron-bound State of Pennsylvania, and now this Congress is called upon to recognize it by a national statute, that its operations may be universal so far as interstate commerce is concerned.

NO MORE FOR A SHORTER THAN FOR A LONGER HAUL.

The fourth section declares that it shall be unlawful to charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul. That means, sir, for instance, that a railroad company or any other common carrier shall not charge A $50 for carrying a car-load of cattle, flour, grain, or other property 100 miles, while it hauls a like car-load for B 200 miles for $40.

This discrimination in favor of long distances over shorter distances is another of the crying grievances of the present system.

Where is the justice of it?

I know that much sophistry has been expended to justify this rule; that gentlemen "versed in railroad matters" have appeared year after year before the Committee on Commerce of this House armed with "statistics" and loaded down with "facts" to show the justice and equity of a rule which taxes one man more for a short service than another for a service perhaps ten times longer.

Well, I do not profess to be "versed in railroad matters" or to be able to converse with the fluency or learning of a Gould upon these subjects, but I do profess to have a modicum of common sense, and it is that which should be brought into play in the consideration of a practical question.

Sir, the most remote part of my district is not more than 175 miles from the city of Baltimore; Chicago, I think, is about 800 miles distant from Baltimore. It costs the people of my district more to send a car-load of ordinary freight to Baltimore than it does the Western shipper to send a car-load of live freight from Chicago to the same point, more than four times as far.

I find that in a former Congress it was shown that a car-load from Omaha to San Francisco cost $300, while from Omaha to Virginia City, a distance of 600 miles this side of San Francisco, the charge was $800, so that for 600 miles shorter haul the charge was $500 more. In my own State along the lines of roads at way stations the rates are much higher for the shorter distances than they are many miles beyond for the longer distances.

So throughout the length and breadth of this country the way stations and shorter distances must pay tribute to the centers and longer distances—they are the pack-horses and must stand all that is put on them.

I recognize the fact, Mr. Speaker, that freight can not be carried as cheaply in proportion for a few miles as for many miles, but I deny that it will cost more to carry a few miles than many miles. The handling is the same in either case, but the wear and tear upon the machinery and track and the expense in fuel is necessarily greater for the many than the few miles.

Why, I understand, in fact it was so stated to the committee, that this system of discrimination is carried to such an extent that in some instances in the transportation of coal differences are made on account of the purposes for which the coal is to be used. If used by some favored enterprise then cheap rates are given; if, however, the enterprise does not have the smiles of the powers that be, high rates are the order.

Now, sir, under this state of things what remedy have the business interests of the country, what redress have agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, the three pillars of our prosperity, unless the strong hand of our National Legislature shall be laid upon these monopolies, and the decree go forth under the great seal of this Government prescribing limits beyond which they shall not go, and laying down rules which they must regard?

We hear protests from all these corporations against what they term "cast-iron rules." We will probably hear the term more than once in this discussion.

This is just what the country demands, strong, unyielding, inflexible rules; rules with no double meaning, subject to no two constructions; rules so plain that the most ordinary mind may comprehend and the humble man understand them; rules so clearly defined that it will require no court or other tribunal to construe them.

In this section, in my opinion, will be found all that may be required to give protection against the short and long haul system of imposition.

SCHEDULES MUST BE POSTED.

The fifth section provides for the posting up of schedules on all roads, setting forth, first, the different kinds and classes of property to be carried; second, the different places between which such property shall be carried; third, the rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or hauling of the same. And the accounts for such services shall show what part of the charges is for transportation, and what part for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities. These schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered. They shall be posted at least five days before they shall go into effect, and it shall be unlawful to charge more than schedule rates.

These, I think, are the leading features of this section, and in them are embodied notice to all shippers as to what they are to pay upon any given commodity or quantity. It will prevent fluctuating rates—high rates to-day, low rates to-morrow, or vice versa—and the business of the country will be conducted with absolute knowledge as to the cost of transportation, and purchases and sales can be made and agreements entered into without speculating as to the cost of reaching market.

DAMAGES FOR VIOLATIONS OF ACT.

Next follow the prohibitory clauses and the measures of damages for any violation of the act; and if, sir, I were to criticise adversely any portion of this bill my criticism would be confined to these clauses. That criticism would be based upon the fact that for any violation only actual damages sustained can be awarded.

In the case of the violation of a simple contract actual damages, of course, constitute the measure of recovery. In simple contracts parties generally act at arm's length. They stand on an equal footing; they are free agents; they can agree and stipulate as they may choose. Not so with a shipper and railroad company. They do not occupy the same position, but the shipper is at the mercy of the company; he may have his shipments ready and his engagements may require him to send them at any cost to guard himself against damages, to protect his credit, or prevent his capital from remaining unproductive. Go they must. The important element of a contract, free and untrammeled consent, is wanting. It is that kind of consent which the traveler gives to the taking of his pocket-book when the highwayman with pistol at his breast demands his money or his life. It is compulsion.

I would treat any violation more in the nature of a test than as a violation of a contract, and apply the rules governing tests and exemplary damages.

If this were done, and these companies were made to understand that when they violate this law, in defiance of right and disregard of the fundamental principle under which they were created, they shall pay to the party injured or imposed upon for every violation not only actual but double or treble damages, you would find them adhering more closely to the track of right and observing more carefully the law of the land.

But, there is another cogent reason why more than actual, which would be construed direct or immediate, damages should be recovered. It is a well-known fact, one attested by the dockets and proceedings of every court in whose jurisdiction runs a railroad, that when a man is courageous enough to institute a suit against a railroad corporation, he is engaging in a litigation which bids fair to outlive him, even though he may be reasonably young in years and vigorous in health; or if he should live to see its final conclusion, he will have passed through years of trouble and vexation, frittered away much valuable time, and incurred losses not computable by any human rule.

A recovery of actual or direct damages is no compensation to him for all that he will have borne, all that he will have lost, all that he will have expended, and all that he will have suffered in the vindication of his rights, the redress of his wrongs, and the prosecution of a litigation not of his seeking, not of his fault, but provoked by a monopoly which in the arrogance of its power and the cupidity of its nature rode phætonlike over personal rights, crushing them under its ponderous wheels.

Sir, this is a land where courage dwells and bravery lives. Its history shines with records of heroism; its tablets sparkle with deeds of valor. On land and sea its flag floats in the breezes of courage, valor, and heroism, filling every soul with national pride.

But as much as I admire the valor, courage, and heroism which would lead to the bayonet point or cannon mouth in the vindication of our national honor, I admire almost as much the moral courage and heroism of he who in the vindication of personal rights and the redress of personal wrongs engages in a combat with a railroad corporation. There is genuine courage, there is true heroism in the act, for unequal is the contest, doubtful the result, however just the cause.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I entertain these views as to the inadequacy of the measure of damages fixed for a violation of the provisions of this bill, I shall not seek to amend this section, being willing to give the railroad companies an opportunity to show their regard for the right and respect for the law, and if they do this, then all will be well; if not, I shall trust to another Congress to increase the measure of damages.

Next follows the penal-punishment section. It reaches the individual, whether a director, receiver, lessee, or agent in his individual capacity, and makes him amenable to an indictment as for a misdemeanor, and liable to a fine of not exceeding $2,000 for any willful violation by commission or omission directly, or aiding or abetting therein.

This section, in my opinion, will go much further in securing adherence to the law than the civil remedy given. It strikes not at the corporation, but at the persons engaged in conducting the corporate business. The civil remedy will rarely be resorted to by a small shipper or poor man, for he will have to engage in years of litigation, as I have said, meeting corporate power single handed, strength with weakness, wealth with poverty. The seventh section will remain virtually a dead letter upon the statute-books so far as he is concerned, but he will find his protection in the penal provisions. The courts of the United States will be thrown open, and the grand juries will indict and the petty juries punish the individual official or employé who willfully violates the law, aids or abets in its violation, or suffers it to be violated.

I have now referred to the main and most important features of this bill. I shall vote for it as an entirety and against any amendment which may tend to weaken its force or lesson its efficiency. Its passage will lead, I trust, to the enactment of similar statutes by the Legislatures of the States respecting their internal commerce, and the good work begun here I hope will spread like a blanket over the States and its healthful influence will be felt in every section and locality. The wide-spreading importance of this measure can not be magnified, and I would wish, sir, for no higher encomiums than will be bestowed by the millions who to-day are suffering under the wrongs of which this bill treats, upon the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN], from whose brain the bill originated, and who has labored for its passage with a perseverance almost akin to that of Hannibal crossing the Alps or of Kepler calculating the laws of planetary motion Its enactment into a law will add fresh laurels to his already decked brow and stand upon the statute-books of the nation to do honor to his name and fame.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House in presenting my objections to the Senate bill. In favoring the House bill I have necessarily outlined my objections to the substitutes, for they are directly antipodal. I want, however, to emphasize one objection, and that is to the commission idea, which is the very bed-rock of the substitute. Speaking with due deference, I must say that in my judgment a more troublesome and intricate and inefficient piece of legal machinery was never suggested. If the most fertile minds in either House of Congress could have been employed to devise means to retard, embarrass, mystify, hinder, and delay the redress of wrongs and the punishment of violations of law they could not in my opinion have succeeded better than the distinguished framer of the Senate bill. It is the very thing the railroads want, since they are convinced that Congress intends to act upon the subject of regulating interstate commerce, for their favorite mode of warfare is to delay, embarrass, and hinder.

I want no commission The Congress of the United States is the commission created by the people for the enactment of laws, and the courts of the country the tribunals for their enforcement.

We have had commissions of various kinds within the last few years, and what good have they done? Absolutely none; but responsibilities have been shirked by their creation.

Let those who have been accredited as the representatives of the people here prove themselves equal to the high duties they have assumed. Let them not stand appalled and paralyzed in the face of corporate power; let them give the relief demanded, assume responsibilities, and not throw them off upon a commission that will be responsible to nobody.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, about concluded my remarks; they have been directed against corporations and not against individuals. There are many gentlemen prominent even in railroad circles who will rejoice with the people over the passage of this bill; for they have recognized the wrongs which have been inflicted, but have been powerless to prevent them. We have a country which is the marvel of the world; it is sublime in its beauty, grand in its extent, and great in its resources.

The Old World looks with amazement upon our broad domain and fertile fields, our inexhaustible supply of mineral wealth, our rivers upon whose bosoms ten times the navies of the world might float and whose waters could drive the machinery of the globe without exhausting a tithe of their power, our railroads linking the hills of Maine with the plains of Texas and traversing the sections from where the sun awakens our people with his first warm morning kiss to where with his last rays he bids the world good-night. We all love our country and feel the glowings of national pride, and we should all seek to promote its growth and add to its prosperity and happiness. We should cultivate broad and liberal views, know no section, build up no locality at the expense of another, oppress no community to prosper its neighbor and discriminate in favor of no class for the benefit of another.

That is the spirit of this bill, and I want to see the Government write over the door of every railroad office in this land: No discrimination, no combination, no unreasonable charges, no favored classes; equal rights to all, special privileges to none.

This is true democracy, and the Democratic party having secured control of the administration of this Government in the election of a Chief Magistrate, after many years of struggle, through the strength of its principles, stands forth to-day in the full blaze of these principles. Let it be true to its history and faithful to its pledges and remove oppression from the shoulders of the people, whether it be imposed by the hand of railroad monopolies or by the masked hand of a high protective tariff, by either or by both. Never since the bells pealed forth the glad tidings of American independence has any party ever had a better oportunity to rally to its standard the people and intrench itself in popular esteem than the Democratic party has at this hour.

Oppressed by monopolies, weighted down by monopolistic exactions, their energies burdened most heavily, their sweat and toil taxed most grievously for the benefit of task-masters, the people are looking, anxiously looking, to this administration for relief. Will it come? Will popular expectation be realized? I trust it may. But if relief should not come, if popular expectation should not be realized, then let the Democratic party so act as to throw the responsibility for the failure upon its political party antagonist, which rests now under popular condemnation.

If this bill is to be defeated and a reduction of tariff burdens is to fail, let not the blame be laid at the door of the party on this side of this House, but cast it at the feet of the party on the other side and let that party face the indignation of a long-oppressed and outraged people.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this all-important measure will become a law, and that it will mark the commencement of an era of Democratic reform, and that like wave upon wave it will spread until every abuse of power and every oppression of the people by monopolies of whatsoever kind may be bound and prevented by the hand and interposition of the Government, to which the people naturally turn for relief and redress. [Great applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the following proceedings took place:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (at 9 o'clock p. m.). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask to be allowed ten minutes more.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have an understanding as to the use of the remaining time. We have an hour and a half on each side. Whatever remains of the hour and a half on this side after the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] are concluded I shall claim the right to use in concluding the debate, and I trust that the gentleman from Virginia will be permitted to occupy as much more of the time on this side as he desires.

Mr. DUNHAM. I suggest that we be allowed to occupy an hour on this side, and that then the other side use its remaining half hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman from Virginia had better go on now.

Mr. DUNHAM. All right.

Mr. O'FERRALL resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remaining twenty minutes to close the debate.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. DUNHAM addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ROWELL addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. DUNHAM. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I indorse most heartily all the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] has just said. It seems to me he has demonstrated beyond question that the remedy that is incorporated in the Senate bill is far superior in all the essentials necessary to success.

I have been wondering, Mr. Speaker, since this bill came up to-day, how long the people would be satisfied with talk and with promises. They have waited a long time for legislation on this subject. I came here at the beginning of the Forty-eighth Congress enthusiastic on this question of giving the people some remedy as against what is called the exactions of the railroad corporations. I have sometimes thought there is a great deal said not strictly true against railroads, but I have known for a long time there was need of some remedy for actual wrongs upon the people. I came here with the purpose of supporting the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in his attempt to pass a law in this behalf. I waited during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress for the gentleman to call up his bill, but all in vain. At the beginning of the second session of that Congress he brought forth his bill. We all know that it did not become a law. The present session has nearly run its eight months' course, and now in the closing hours of the session this bill which came from the Senate in the early days of May is taken up for action. Can the people be deceived into the belief that this delay was unavoidable or accidental?

Gentlemen on the other side say they have no faith in the honesty of a commission. I submit if there is not some danger of the people coming to the conclusion there is no faith to be placed in the United States Congress. I make no charges of bad faith, but it appears to me that if the gentleman should sit down with the purpose of devising a plan to defeat legislation in the Forty-ninth Congress on this question he could not succeed better than he is likely to do by the course he has taken here.

There is but little difference beyond pride of opinion between the Senate bill and the House bill brought forward here, the main difference being the remedy for the enforcement of the provisions of the bills. I have no time to go into that question, and will only say my convictions are clearly with the commission plan. The House amendments are simply the common law emphasized by statutes which will threaten but are too cumbersome to be practical and too expensive to bring relief to the class of people who need relief.

I can do no more than to say that the gentleman from Illinois has demonstrated beyond question that the remedy sought in the Senate bill is far more practical and likely to be much more effective than that which is the pet theory, and the only one which the gentleman from Texas will permit. He seems bent on securing his exact remedy or defeating all remedy whatsoever. And what is to be the outcome? We are to have the experience of the Forty-eighth Congress repeated in the experience of the Forty-ninth. The bill is not to become a law; and the gentleman from Texas is to return to Texas, preceded by his speeches, all telling a story of his usual Herculean efforts to curb the rapacity of railroads, and the gentleman from Virginia to his home in the Shenandoah Valley and to tell the people there through his speech what magnificent words he has uttered and promises made in their behalf, and to confess, alas, that he never was privileged to vote upon the final passage of the interstate-commerce act. That is not what I want. If the bill the Senate offered us early in the session is not perfect, there is another session of the Congress to come, in which its provisions can be amended and its imperfections made into perfections, and all the skill and ingenuity of the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Virginia can be brought forward in that behalf.

Why, sir, it seems to me now from the utterances of this evening that it is just a question whether the gentleman's bill, which he has been nursing for eleven long years all in vain, shall be the bill passed or whether it shall be the bill which has come from the other end of the Capitol bearing another gentleman's name attached thereto. If that is what we are here for, if we are here to skirmish for personal position and to kill all anti-discrimination legislation unless it bears the name of the gentleman from Texas, the sooner we adjourn the better. Before doing so, however, I am determined the country shall understand the farce being played here session after session of the Congress. The gentleman must not say I charge him with insincerity; I disclaim any such purpose. I have a right, however, to refer to facts, and leave him to reconcile his course with what he may conceive to be his duty. The Senate bill is here demanding action at our hands. It has been here waiting that action for two months. I grant you it is not perfect; neither is the substitute proposed. It is manifestly the best to be had. This is the last chance for the exercise of a little statesmanship. The gentleman can pass this bill any day he will. Its defeat must therefore be charged to him and those who act with him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, if no other gentleman on that side desires to be heard to-night I shall ask the attention of the House for a few moments, to answer some suggestions made in this debate.

It has been a source of regret to me all the evening to hear the question of my own personality introduced into the discussion of this great measure. A measure, sir, which involves the interests of sixty million of people, which affects property of corporations of the nominal value of $7,000,000,000, which transport fifteen thousand millions of interstate property annually, a question which affects the rights of all of these people and the values of all of their property, such a question should never be affected by the consideration of the hopes, the fears, or the aspirations of any single individual. And it would be a source of profound regret to me to believe that I should stand in the way, or that my poor name should stand in the way, of the consideration of a just and necessary measure of great public importance and public good.

The gentlemen who have discussed this subject this evening have all been in favor of railroad regulation, so far as it relates to interstate commerce, by Congress. It is within your memory, Mr. Speaker, when they entertained other views. It has not been long that they have all been in favor of regulations like this. For six or seven weary years I fought the battle against railroad corporations, their counsel and their officers, struggling to defeat any possible legislation upon the subject and denying the power of Congress over it. At last the arguments and appeals for a measure of justice to the American people, and the awakening by them to their own interest, have been heard by the Congress of the United States, and by consent now that legislation which eleven years ago I said was necessary is by their acknowledgment necessary. That, at least, is some gratification to me. It ought to be some gratification to this country that at last the legislators of this country have come to understand themselves the necessity for such legislation.

The Senate during its last session appointed a committee to collect information upon the subject. That committee industriously and with great ability collected a vast amount of valuable information of which we should avail ourselves. Based upon that information the Senate have passed a bill. I have, and on a former occasion to-day, shown the contrast between the provisions of the Senate bill and the House bill. My hope is, sir, whether it be the one or the other that is to be adopted, that in the short remaining days of this session we are to reach at last practical legislation and practical results upon this question; and I trust in reaching that result, without reference to the authorship of bills, that we shall secure the enactment by Congress of this great principle of justice which commands the approbation of all disinterested people and which in the end will be as beneficial to the railroad companies as to the people at large.

I am a little surprised to see that gentlemen base their advocacy of the Senate bill upon the fact that it came from the Senate, and is a bill which has passed one House. Do gentlemen forget that in the Forty-fifth Congress a bill passed this House, I mean the House bill now before us, but with some slight modifications, and by a decided majority? That bill was sent to the Senate and fell upon the leaden ears of that body. They did not seem to think legislation was neccessary. Is it forgotten that in the Forty-eighth Congress this bill, slightly modified, again passed with an increased majority, and went to the Senate, and that the Senate then prepared a substitute for it which, with all respect to that body, fell far short of meeting the necessities for legislation on this subject?

But their investigations of the last year have enabled them to make a very decided improvement in the bill of this year, and that leads to the hope that they will sufficiently understand the interest and the desires of the country, and be sufficiently obedient to the will of the people to consent upon conference to a just bill. My hope is to get this bill through here and let it go to conference as early as possible for the purpose of reaching a practical result.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who discussed this subject ably, as he discusses all subjects, asked what reason there was for desiring to pass the House bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] who has just spoken, stated that he would prefer no bill to the House bill. Mr. Speaker, there are a few things that ought never to be forgotten in discussing this subject. The House bill is new in many of its features.

I admit and believe that no bill of the same character has heretofore been presented to a legislative body anywhere in the world. I claim that for it. What does it contain? First, it declares that all charges shall be reasonable. That is one of the "iron-clad" provisions that gentleman find in this bill. Who can gainsay that proposition? What honest man will controvert it? Next, the bill says there shall be no rebates, no drawbacks, no secret dealings by which one man or set of men may be swindled for the benefit of another man or another set of men. It provides means by which publicity shall be given to the action of the railroad companies and by which justice shall be meted out alike to the rich and the poor, the exalted and the humble. What is wrong in that? Who dares controvert its justice? Next, it says that more shall not be charged for hauling a given amount and kind of property a shorter than a longer distance, the shorter being embraced in the longer.

The House has heard elaborate arguments this evening, which I have heard repeated over and over for ten years, to demonstrate that it is honest and right to charge one man $25 for hauling a car-load of freight from Chicago to New York and at the same time to charge another man $100 for hauling a like car-load from Pittsburgh to New York. Now, sir, there is not genius, ability, plausibility, nor eloquence enough in all the hired talent of the railroad corporations to convince an honest man that that is right. What is that provision of the bill? We have been told this evening that it would work unjust discrimination. Two gentlemen from Illinois have said that. How unjust? If the railroads running, for instance, from Chicago to New York are told, "You may charge to way stations along the route as much as you charge between your terminal points, but you shall not charge more," what is the wrong? Who is injured?

It is the short-haul man that is discriminated against because he may, in that event, be required to pay as much as the long-haul man; but the bill says that he shall not be required to pay more. If he is compelled to pay more, what is the result? It is that the railroads, to secure freight at a competing point, may haul from that point at rates below what will pay, and if they do that and lose upon the transaction they claim the right to charge the people at the way-stations enough more than should be charged for hauling their freight to make up the loss of revenue from the undercharge upon the freight hauled between the terminal points. Is that right? What is the effect of it? If they be permitted to charge for hauling to intermediate stations more than they charge shippers at the terminal point—remember, it is not more per ton per mile, but more in the aggregate for a given amount or kind of freight—if, I say, they be permitted to charge shippers at way-stations more than they charge shippers at the terminal points, then they have the power to force the manufacturing of the country from the towns and villages and neighborhoods where living is cheap and health is good, to the trade centers where there are competing roads, and the power to enrich those at these centers by impoverishing the people at the cities, towns, and communities at intermediate points. What more? If they can charge more to shippers at the intermediate places than to those at the terminal points, they can thereby increase the value of the real estate around the centers where there is competition and reduce the value of land, the value of labor, the value of everything that makes up the comforts of life at every intermediate point between the terminal stations.

I say to you, gentlemen, that there is not a government on earth whose administration is based upon the principles of justice that would dare to exercise such a power. The Government of the United States would not and could not do it. No State in this Union would or could do it. Yet it is claimed for these railroad corporations that they may do what neither the Federal Government nor the State governments would do or dare attempt to do! That is not all. We say in this bill that the railroad companies shall post up their schedules of rates so that the citizen may know how much is to be charged, so that the railroad companies may be bound by their charges, and can not in litigation introduce expert witnesses to deceive and befog juries by the consideration of what they call "all the elements which enter into the consideration of fair and reasonable rates."

Besides that, it is a measure which shows the people what they have to pay and prevents discrimination by requiring the posting up of rates. It becomes a measure of evidence; it saves expense in litigation; it promotes the ends of justice. The Senate bill pretends to do this, but does not, just as it pretends to establish a rule with reference to the long and short haul, while in fact it presents a meaningless section, a section which I defy any lawyer, Congressman, or any one else to show has any earthly signification. And it goes on, as if it meant something, to provide in the end that it may be nullified and set aside by this commission which it is proposed to introduce between the citizen and the railroad company.

Another thing: the House bill prohibits the pooling of freights and prohibits the dividing of the proceeds or any part of the proceeds coming from the freights. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] this evening made the criticism that this bill only prohibited pooling freights and did not prohibit pooling money. The gentleman had read the bill to little purpose. It prohibits the pooling of freights and the dividing of the product of the pool.

These pooling arrangements enable the making of one vast monopoly from several small monopolies, and would give to the railroads control of the transportation and commerce and wealth of the country, and ultimately the control of its politics and its liberties. Pooling, in principle, has been forbidden by the common law for six hundred years and more; it is forbidden by the constitutions of many States, and by the laws of many others; forbidden by the whole line of judicial decisions running through many years; and I referred to a number of such decisions to-day.

Now the House bill proposes to do something to protect the people. The Senate bill proposes to inquire whether something is necessary to be done. These are the main features of difference between the bills. The one proposes to protect the people, the other proposes to create a commission which may furnish some measure of protection, but dodges the three great fundamental principles that must be incorporated into any measure in order to furnish a proper system of regulation on this subject—that is to say, it fails to meet the necessities growing out of the question of the long and short hauls; it fails to meet the question of the prohibition of pooling; and it fails to meet the question of requiring rates to be posted up. It pretends to make a requirement for the posting up of rates, but it authorizes the commission to disregard its requirements.

These are some of the main features of difference. Of course I can not in this brief way answer all the arguments which have been made to-night, nor do I deem it important to do so. But I do wish to add one further suggestion.

The methods of railroad management in the European countries and in the United States are a confessed failure, according to the admissions of the ablest railroad experts. Why a failure? Because the methods adopted are not based upon the principles of justice, but upon the principles of selfishness and of greed. All the railroad men will tell you that their methods of regulation are a failure. No railroad man will tell you that he can see light beyond, under the existing system, by which reasonable regulations can be made. If all railroad men would accept, as some of them are willing to do, the House bill, which does not pretend to enter into detailed regulation of freight rates, but simply abridges the monopoly powers of these corporations and proposes to enforce by proper remedies the principles I have stated, they would find its tendency would be to conduct them gradually but steadily to a system of management based upon the principles of justice, which would avoid railroad strikes, and would take away the inducement the companies now have to regard each other, as Mr. Adams has said in his book, as nothing better than horse jockeys, each one trying to cheat every other.

Adopt the principles laid down in this bill—principles imbedded in fairness, in justice, in equity—and we would say to these companies: "You must charge for all distances what will carry your freight. If you can make something by charging for the shorter distances an amount equal to that charged for longer distances, you may do it; but you shall not compel a part of the producers of this country—the farmers, the mechanics, the manufacturers—to enrich another part by paying for their transportation."

For the benefit of the two gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM and Mr. ROWELL] I read the following resolution, adopted by the State grange of Illinois, I believe, at its last annual meeting:

Brother Hopson presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

"Resolved, By the State grange of Illinois now in session, that the course of Senator CULLOM in being instrumental in defeating the passage of the Reagan interstate commerce bill in Congress at its late session is severely condemned by this body."

And the following extract from the report of a committee of the State grange of Illinois, dated, I believe, about last January:

A bill was introduced into the Forty-fourth Congress by Judge REAGAN, of Texas, for "regulating interstate commerce," which this State grange and nearly every State grange indorsed, and for the passage of which our whole fraternity labored and petitioned. This bill passed the House of the Forty-fifth Congress with 35 majority, but found its winding-sheet and final resting-place in the Senate, where the railroad influence seemed to have concentrated its strength and fortified against the prayers and influence of an oppressed people. A bill containing the same just and wise provisions was again introduced by the indomitable REAGAN, and passed the House of the last Congress, but met the fate of its predecessor in the Senate. The Senate did, however, pass a substitute for the bill, providing for an expensive railroad commission—to be appointed by the President and the Senate and paid by the people's money—to make regulations for companies engaged in interstate traffic. We are satisfied that the action of the House in rejecting this measure was in harmony with the views of our members and the public sentiment generally, for experience hath shown that the smaller the body or commission having public interest in charge and the farther the appointing power which creates it is removed from the ballot-box the less interest will it have for the people's rights, and the more potent will mercenary influences be to control it.

From these proceedings of an intelligent, numerous, and worthy body of men engaged in agricultural and other industrial pursuits in the State of Illinois, and constantly brought into contact with railroad management, and who are deeply interested in the action to be taken by Congress on this subject, it will be seen that they express a clear and decided preference for the Reagan bill over the Cullom bill, and I leave these two gentlemen from Illinois to settle with the farmers, the merchants, and the people generally of Illinois for their disregard of their wishes on this subject. I congratulate these gentlemen, however, on having advanced far enough on this subject to consent that some legislation is necessary, and shall hope that it will not be a great while until they conclude that real legislation for the benefit of the people should be adopted instead of something calculated to delude and deceive them.

I must make one more observation. The early legislation in the several States on this subject was faulty, and in many instances was not successfully enforced by the courts, because those who matured such legislation were not equal to the task of providing laws that would stand the test of judicial examination. It has been my hope that any legislation which may be adopted by Congress will be so clear and explicit as to guard against disappointing the people and discouraging them from further efforts, if further efforts be necessary, at legislation for the preservation of the public interests.

If we adopt the Senate's bill it will, in my judgment, certainly fall short of what the public has a right to expect, and when we afterward attempt to correct its defects we shall probably be met with the statement that "you have once tried to legislate by Congress for the interest of the people and failed." And this will be offered as an argument why we should not attempt to legislate again.

If the House bill be adopted, its remedies are clear, specific, and unmistakable, and they are so just and reasonable as not to operate any injustice to any one. Gentlemen have dwelt upon the idea that the provisions of the House bill are arbitrary, iron-clad they call it. Any felon would say that the law punishing larceny, burglary, robbery, and murder was iron-clad, and he would have as much reason for saying so as these gentlemen have for calling the bill arbitrary, because it prohibits wrong and provides for the punishment of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. If there is no further discussion desired I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 22, 1886.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of the Board of Trade of Jacksonville, Fla., respectfully urging that provision be made by the present Congress for the protection and prosecution of the important public works which have been undertaken by the Government for the improvement of rivers and harbors. The board is impressed with the fact that the entire country will suffer if there be a failure to make suitable appropriation for the more important of these works.

The petition also calls attention to the fact that if these appropriations are permitted to lapse it will involve great damage to works now in course of construction; that as to the jetties at the mouth of the Saint John's River there is every reason to believe the work vigorously prosecuted will prove an early and complete success, while an interruption for another year will prove most disastrous and destructive to these works.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I also present a petition and resolution of the Board of Trade of Jacksonville, Fla., the preamble of the resolution reciting:

Whereas as a great scarcity of small bills exists at the present time, and those which are in circulation are so ragged, worn, and filthy that they are unfit for use; and

Whereas it appears from the report of the Treasurer of the United States for 1885 that this is due to a practice adopted by the Treasury in May, 1885, in assorting notes sent for redemption, reissuing such as were fit for circulation, &c.

They therefore pray that there may be a new issue of notes and small bills which are generally preferred for circulation to a heavy and inconvenient metal currency. They further state that their resolution must not be construed as either advocating or opposing the cause of silver, greenbacks, or national bank-note currency, but is simply expressive of the public wish for a sufficient supply of clean, well secured paper currency of the denomination of one and two dollars.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of Watson Brothers Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Portersville, Pa., and a petition of McPherson Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for certain legislation favorable to ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Freeland, Pa., praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH presented a memorial of 256 citizens of Rhode Island, remonstrating against the passage of the oleomargarine bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of Rhode Island, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COKE presented five petitions of citizens of Texas, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Ralph W. Lowe and 510 citizens of the tenth Congressional district of Illinois, and the petition of Lincoln A. Little and 250 citizens of the seventh Congressional district of Illinois, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented several papers on the subject of the Haskell multicharge gun, and moved their reference to the Committee on Printing; which was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2791) to provide for an American register for the steamer Nuevo Montezuma, of Philadelphia, Pa., reported it without amendment.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon.

A bill (H. R. 7234) granting a pension to Susan Hawes;

A bill (H. R. 7244) granting a pension to Robert B. Kirkpatrick;

A bill (H. R. 8481) granting a pension to Thomas Walsh;

A bill (H. R. 8556) granting a pension to Abraham Points; and

A bill (H. R. 9052) granting an increase of pension to Capt. John F. Morris.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2774) to provide a pension for Mrs. Anna Etheridge Hooks, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1553) granting a pension to Mrs. E. G. C. Abbott; and

A bill (H. R. 4460) to pension John W. Delph.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7721) granting a pension to Ellen J. Welch, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1189) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 2871) for the relief of Semon, Bache & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. GIBSON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-SERVICE RULES.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Civil Service be, and they hereby are, directed to send to the Senate, as soon as may be, a copy of the civil-service rules and regulations, both general and special, as they were in force on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1885; and also copies of all changes and modifications thereof, both general and special, made since said date; and also copies of any and all special orders or general orders made by any authority in reference thereto, or action thereunder, since said date.

Resolved, further, That said commissioners send to the Senate any and all information in their possession touching any and all alleged or supposed violations of any of said rules and regulations.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8974) "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

W. B. ALLISON,
H. L. DAWES,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
GEO. C. CABELL,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say in respect to this report that the Senate and House conferees were unable to agree. The House still insists upon its disagreement to the votes on the three propositions before submitted.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator will permit me I desire to ask him a question in regard to the bill. This is the bill making appropriations for the various Executive Departments of the Government, and I desire to know if the sums appropriated in the bill will be sufficient to enable the Treasury Department through the Internal-Revenue Bureau to carry into effect what is known as the oleomargarine law, if it shall finally become a law.

Mr. ALLISON. The amount appropriated in the bill with our amendments will be sufficient, although if the House insists upon its disagreement to the provision relating to the collection of revenue it of course will not be.

Mr. MILLER. Then I hope that the Senate conferees will insist on the amendment of the Senate in that respect, so that if the bill which has passed here shall become a law the Treasury Department will find itself in possession of funds under a regular appropriation act to carry out the provisions of that law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What motion does the Senator from Iowa make?

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate still further insist upon the amendments in controversy. Does the Senator from Iowa also ask for a conference?

Mr. ALLISON. I will include the asking for a further conference in my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And ask for a further conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar will be proceeded with under the special order, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read from the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings as follows:

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator will allow me to ask unanimous consent that we may have to-morrow morning the usual Calendar hour until half past 12 I think we can dispose of it and probably of a large number of bills to which there is no objection. I ask that unanimous consent be given now that to-morrow after the routine morning business we have until half past 12 o'clock for unobjected cases on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. PUGH. I feel constrained to object.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not object to taking for the Calendar whatever time there may be after the routine business to-morrow morning until half past 12 o'clock. There is not a Senator here who has not some matter on the Calendar to which there can be no objection. It is for to-morrow morning, not this morning.

Mr. CONGER. I asked for to-morrow morning.

Mr. PUGH. If it is for to-morrow, I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the order suggested by the Senator from Michigan will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under that order the Calendar will be proceeded with, beginning at the point where its consideration was left off under the prior order.

SETTLERS AND PURCHASERS OF LAND IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

The bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas was announced as first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read through and partially considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither of the Senators from Nebraska is here, and I suggest that the bill be passed by informally, not losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside informally.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a measure of very great local importance to the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and as the Senator who reported the bill [Mr. VAN WYCK] is not in, I hope that permission may be given that the bill may be called up when he comes in, if before half past 12.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggested that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been passed over informally, and can be called up when the Senator from Nebraska comes in.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD BRANCHES.

The bill (S. 2395) to authorize and empower the Union Pacific Railroad to construct branch roads was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. I am not sure that I have made the annunciation to the Senate heretofore, but I will say now that it does not seem to be expedient to deal with that question at the present session. I understand that it is quite likely before this session ends, or early next session, there will be before the Senate in a constitutional way another bill for its concurrence covering the same subject; and I would rather deal with that measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WARREN MITCHELL.

The bill (S. 31) for the relief of Warren Mitchell was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. That is a contested case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

GREELY ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

The bill (S. 1987) for the relief of David L. Brainard and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $703.75 in lieu of commutations of fuel and quarters and extra-duty pay to the persons named, who were on duty with Lieut. A. W. Greely in the arctic regions from July 1, 1881, to June 30, 1884.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, however, That if any of the aforesaid nineteen persons shall have died prior to June 30, 1884, the allowances herein for commutation of fuel, extra-duty pay, and quarters shall be computed at the rates stated to the death of such persons respectively; and in such case the amounts found due shall be paid to the widow of the deceased, if any survive; and if none, to the children, if any; and if none, then to the next of kin of such person lawfully entitled.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report. I dare say it is all right, but supposing one of these persons had died after that date, I do not see why somebody should not be entitled to draw commutation down to that date just the same as if he had continued to live.

Mr. MANDERSON. I find it difficult to hear the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stated that I should like to hear the report. I have no doubt this is a very meritorious thing, but I called attention to the date fixed, of a person dying prior to a certain date in 1884 and supposed the case of dying the day afterward, if you please, and made the inquiry whether in such a case the bill provided for the widows and heirs being able to get anything at all.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think that is covered by the bill. The report will show.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is very long.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the report be read and I will look at the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report proper, without the appendix, will be read.

Mr. MANDERSON. The reason for that provision, I will say to the Senator from Vermont, is that that is the date of the closing of this duty. If they died after that time, that would have been upon some other duty and would not be entitled to this extra pay and commutation of fuel and rations. The report will show, I think, very clearly.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. MANDERSON June 22, 1886, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1987) entitled "A bill for the relief of David L. Brainard and others," have had the same under consideration, and submit the same for favorable consideration, with an amendment:

"Provided, however, That if any of the aforesaid nineteen persons shall have died prior to June 30, 1884, the allowances herein for commutation of fuel, extra-duty pay, and quarters shall be computed at the rates stated to the dates of the deaths of such persons respectively, and in such case the amounts found due shall be paid to the widow of the deceased, if any survive, and if none, to the children, if any, and if none, then to the next of kin of such person lawfully entitled."

In the judgment of your committee, the proposition embraced in this bill is one that appeals to a sense of justice, and the relief sought has been too long denied.

The enlisted men named in this measure accompanied Lieutenant Greely on the Lady Franklin Bay expedition in 1881-'84, and they and the families and representatives of those deceased each ask payment of the sum of $703.75, in lieu of commutations of fuel, quarters, and extra-duty pay, which they would have received as enlisted men had they remained at home.

Your committee will assume that the facts connected with this expedition and the hardships endured by those named in this bill are too fresh in the public mind to require repetition. The appeal of these men is not only just, with precedent in support of it, but the heroism exhibited and the hardships endured by the petitioners should have stimulated earlier action as an evidence of a desire of the representatives of the American people to reward those who were willing to sacrifice their lives and their health in the cause of science.

Justice has been tardy. Fourteen of the nineteen persons named in this bill are dead, and at the rate of progress which their prayer for relief has made, all may be deceased ere action is taken. The families of those who have died, with one exception, are in necessitous circumstances. It seems a commentary upon the administration of public affairs that these men have been so long denied that which men in similar grades in the Army receive on duty at home. Whether the defect which has deprived them of this exists in the law, in the administration of it, or in the original orders as construed, is of no practical consequence. These men were selected for this expedition because of their superior probable strength and endurance, and the result proved the wisdom of the choice. They enlisted for this hazardous voyage, understanding that the commutation asked for would be accorded, and it is also a circumstance worthy of consideration in their behalf that no promotion has followed as a reward for their services, and the plaudits of the people are found a poor substitute for the money which they ask, to which they are entitled, which they have come to require, and which they would have received had they remained in Washington.

When Sergt. David L. Brainard and his companions named in this bill returned from this expedition, the Government, on settling their accounts, refused all commutation for fuel; it paid commutation for quarters from June 30, 1882, but refused it for the period previous to that time, and it allowed extra-duty pay up to July 14, 1883, refusing it for the period subsequent to that date.

No attempt to reconcile this action upon any plane of consistency or of equitable requirement, regard being had for arctic climate and the situation of these men otherwise, will be made by your committee.

It is sufficient for the purposes of reaching a just conclusion to say that, independent of the support given this measure in the annexed exhibits, which your committee ask may be made a part of this report, the measure seems eminently equitable and just, and, in the judgment of your committee, the bill should pass with the amendment suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the bill here, and the amendment I find needs a little amendment. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding at the end of it the words:

And if any of said persons have died since said date, the sum due such person shall be paid to his widow, children, or next of kin, in the order aforesaid.

So as to provide for the case of any of these persons who may have died after the date down to which they would be entitled to this allowance, and before the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. There were nineteen of these persons on the Greely expedition. Fourteen of them died before the 30th day of June, 1884. Five are yet living. I think it well that this amendment should be added to the amendment of the committee, because it might be that some may die before this bill shall become operative by passage in the other House. Therefore I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS AND PURCHASERS OF LAND IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas. The bill was in order at the commencement of the call of the Calendar to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand that it needs any motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not.

Mr. HAWLEY. When that bill was up before my colleague [Mr. PLATT] was on the floor and somebody made an objection, if I recollect aright, and the bill went over. He also made objection to and criticism of the bill. He is detained on Senate duty now.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless the rule relating to unanimous consent is adhered to—if it is interfered with at all—I shall ask to take up the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. This is not an interference. The bill was passed over informally awaiting the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not wish to object, but I shall be obliged to do so, because I know my colleague desires to be heard on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Connecticut listen for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think the Senator from Connecticut should be in such haste. I understand from a conversation in the presence of the Senator from Nebraska, in which I explained the bill to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], that he was entirely satisfied with it. Of course, if the business of the Senate is to be delayed because Senators are not here on the supposition that they might object if they were here, we can not get on.

Mr. HAWLEY. If this is to go on according to rule, and I am to object, I will withdraw my objection, but it is nothing unusual to interpose an objection. If the Senator has conversed with my colleague since this matter was up before, and if my colleague has expressed his entire satisfaction, I have nothing more to say, though the bill ought to be argued and explained at length.

Mr. CULLOM. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that his colleague is in a committee-room at hand and can be sent for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us send for him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally as before, and the next case on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

FRANCES H. PLUMMER.

The bill (H. R. 3750) for the relief of Frances H. Plummer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $1,000 to Frances H. Plummer, widow of J. B. Plummer, deceased, in full satisfaction and discharge of any and all claims against the United States for the loss of property by J. B. Plummer or his widow at the evacuation of Fort Cobb, Indian Territory, in May, 1861.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAWLEY June 22, 1886:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3750) for the relief of Frances H. Plummer, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

That the committee adopts and presents again the favorable report presented in the first session of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, as follows:

"That the late Brig. Gen. Joseph B. Plummer, a graduate of the United States Military Academy, served honorably in the Florida and Mexican wars. At the breaking out of the rebellion he was a captain in command of two companies of the First United States Infantry, stationed at Fort Cobb, in the Indian Territory. In Texas General Twiggs joined the confederacy and surrendered his forces. A considerable force of rebels, marching northward from Texas, occupied Fort Washita the day Lieutenant-Colonel Emory evacuated it, and on the 5th of May, 1861, a large body of Texans occupied Arbuckle. The retreating Union forces were directed to concentrate at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. Captain Plummer evacuated Fort Cobb May 5, and marching rapidly joined Lieutenant-Colonel Emory May 9, and proceeded to Kansas. He commanded the First United States Infantry at Wilson's Creek and was severely wounded. He became colonel of the Eleventh Missouri Volunteers, and for gallantry at Fredericktown, October, 1861, he was promoted to be a brigadier-general. He served with distinction in many battles, and died of his wounds at Corinth, Miss., August 9, 1862, leaving a dependent widow.

"Of the three officers with him when he evacuated Fort Cobb, two joined the confederacy. He had two companies of infantry and but seven wagons for transportation of necessary supplies and seven camp women and their children. His own property he left behind, save what he placed in five large chests and intrusted to the care of Tucker Barton, the sutler, who was supposed to have engaged to take them to Fort Smith and ship them to Saint Louis. Barton, who, like his brother, Captain Barton, of the same command, joined the confederacy, says he was to take them to New Orleans and ship them to New York city. The following is an extract from his affidavit:

"'At the time of said evacuation the United States did not have sufficient transportation for the baggage and effects of the officers stationed at said post, for which reason Capt. J. B. Plummer, First Infantry, United States Army, intrusted to him, to be taken to New Orleans, and thence shipped to New York, if possible, several (he thinks seven) large chests, which he represented contained articles of great value, the collection of a lifetime; that a few days after leaving Fort Cobb his train was approached and surrounded by a large body of armed men from Texas, several hundred in number; that he was made prisoner by them on the ground that he was giving aid and comfort to the United States, the parties claiming to hold commissions from the State of Texas; that the chests, being marked in the name of the said Capt. J. B. Plummer, United States Army, were declared forfeited, and were forcibly taken from his possession by said body of armed men. This was done partly in the Indian Territory and partly in the State of Texas, in the month of May, 1861.'

"A favorable report upon this case in the House during the Forty-fifth Congress says:

"'Your committee recognize the fact that when war is actually going on there are many kinds of property that the Government is not liable to pay officers for in case of loss by capture or otherwise, for the reason that at such a time officers must necessarily take the risk and hazard of the service themselves. The Government has, however, provided by law for the payment to officers for horses killed or lost in battle or by the dangers of the sea while being transported (Revised Statutes, section 3482), and also for losses by officers, non-commissioned officers, or privates in the military service, while in the line of duty, of horses and certain other property, by capture or necessary abandonment, &c. (Revised Statutes, sections 3483, 3484, and 3485.) No provision of law, however, gives the right to any Department, officer, or court to pay this claim.

"'In analogy to the foregoing legal provisions a part of your committee thinks this claim should be paid. A portion of the committee finds the claim should be paid, for the further reason that governments have usually undertaken to reimburse their citizens for property lost which was at the outbreak of a war in an enemy's country and seized and confiscated.

"'At the time war was declared with Mexico an American citizen was in the port of Vera Cruz with his ship, which was seized and confiscated. The United States Government paid for this vessel and its cargo. If a government should pay to its private citizens such losses, much more favorably should it regard the claims for losses of its own officers who are so unfortunate as to be serving, when war breaks out, under orders in a territory which becomes, without fault of theirs, insurrectionary or enemy's territory.'

"The committee all think the claim made by Mrs. Plummer for the loss of Captain Plummer's goods ought to be paid as a matter of right and public policy. Its payment is no precedent for payments for captured or abandoned property in an enemy's country. Captain Plummer lost a large amount of personal property, making his military duties his first consideration, but he saved his troops and led them to battle with great vigor and courage."

A sworn schedule of the goods lost gives as their value the sum of $2,120, but some of them were articles of luxury not usual nor necessary in a frontier camp, and the committee recommend concurrence in the House bill naming $1,000 as the sum to be paid Mrs. Plummer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS AND PURCHASERS OF LAND IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has come into the Chamber, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of land on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and the pending amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That for the purpose of reimbursing persons, and the grantees, heirs, and devisees of persons, who, under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, settled upon or purchased lands within the grant made by an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1866, and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which persons, or their grantees, heirs, or devisees, decrees have been rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of said grant made in the act above entitled, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as shall be required for said purpose, is hereby appropriated: Provided, however, That no part of said sum shall be paid to any one of said parties until he shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of the said decree, duly certified, and also a certificate of the judge of said court rendering the same to the effect that such decree was rendered in a bona fide controversy between a plaintiff showing title under the grant made in said act and a defendant holding the patent or holding by deed under the patentee, and that the decision was in favor of the plaintiff on the ground of the priority of the grant made by said act to the filing, settlement, or purchase by the defendant or his grantor; and said claimant shall also file with the said decree and certificate a bill of the costs in such case, duly certified by the clerk and judge of said court. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the amount due to each defendant on the basis of $3.50 per acre for the tract his title to which shall have failed as aforesaid, and the costs appearing by the bill thereof. He shall then make a requisition upon the Treasury for the sum found to be due to such claimant, or his heirs and devisees or assigns, and shall pay the same to him, taking such release, acquittance, or discharge as shall forever bar any further claim against the United States on account of the failure of the title as aforesaid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any written report with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report noted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a very large bill, Mr. President, to go through by unanimous consent. The first appropriation (how much more will be required we do not know) is $250,000. I notice that the amendment provides for paying these people $3.50 an acre as the basis of valuation, although they were the purchasers of this land either at $1.25 an acre or if it was alternate sections, I suppose, where there was a railroad at $2.50 an acre. I do not see the propriety of the United States paying persons who gave $1.25 an acre $3.50 an acre and appropriating $250,000 for it. I should like to hear that explained before I agree to consider the bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to state that this is not a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Lands. I did not agree to the report.

The bill as it passed the House provided that where persons had purchased this character of lands at a dollar and a quarter an acre, only a dollar and a quarter should be refunded to them. The Senate committee proposes to strike that out and pay all parties, whether they paid a dollar and a quarter an acre to the Government or whether they obtained the land under homestead or pre-emption laws, three dollars and a half an acre.

In my opinion, not more than two dollars and a half in any case should be paid to homestead entrymen or those who entered under the pre-emption act. Certainly it has never been the practice of the Government to pay more than a dollar and a quarter, or to refund the purchase-money in that character of case where the title failed. I do not think the Government ever warranted the title to land further than the purchase-money.

I understand that hundreds of acres of this land are not improved, and though perhaps the parties purchased at a dollar and a quarter an acre, the Committee on Public Lands proposes to pay those parties three dollars and a half an acre where they only paid one dollar and a quarter an acre. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment as it comes from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BERRY. I have not objected and I do not intend to object, but I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Vermont wants to know why $3.50 should be paid. Fifteen or seventeen years ago, or thereabouts, the Government of the United States sold the most of this land for two dollars and a half an acre. Still a small portion of it was sold for a dollar and a quarter an acre, it being offered land. Some of it was taken by homesteaders who went upon the land and made their homes.

It was later discovered that when the United States sold the land it had not any title, that it belonged to a railroad company. The railroad company sold the property to a Mr. Knevals, of New York city, who brought suit against these settlers or a portion of them and ousted them. Subsequently he compromised with as many of these settlers as were willing to pay to him three dollars and a half an acre for the land.

A number of them had gone through the expenses of heavy litigation, including litigation in the Supreme Court of the United States. They concluded to buy out the title that they supposed they had bought in the first instance from the Government and paid $3.50 an acre.

So all these people, as I understand it, have already paid $3.50 an acre to the railroad grantee. They paid from a dollar and a quarter to two dollars and a half an acre to the Government, and it seems to me that it is nothing more than fair that the Government should make these people whole as to the amount of money actually paid out. To have done that would require the payment of $4.25 in some cases and $6 in others. The committee concluded to make the basis of their proceeding just what they had paid to the railroad company's grantee.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from Colorado if there are not cases occurring daily where parties purchased land from the Government, twenty, thirty, and fifty years ago, at $1.25 or $2.50 an acre, and where the title failed, and now the Government only pays back to them, without interest, the amount of money that they paid for the lands? If that be true in all other cases, why should these parties who only paid $1.25 an acre receive more than that sum?

Mr. TELLER. It is very true that the Government of the United States declines to pay any interest or damages, and if the man who deals with the Government of the United States gets back the money that he ever paid the Government after it gets into its coffers, he is in great luck and he is generally content not to get any interest. If I sell a piece of land to my neighbor, and I have not the title, he does not simply come back for the purchase-money, but he demands of me the interest on it, he demands of me everything that it takes to make him whole in that line.

These men bought this land, went upon it, paid taxes on it for fifteen years or thereabouts, found the Government had no title, were ousted in a proceeding in the Government court, and then paid, to settle the title which they supposed they had from the Government, $3.50 an acre; and now we are asked to go back to the iron rule that the Government of the United States does not pay interest because it is supposed always to be ready to pay its debts. This is more than a debt.

It is true that the Government of the United States does not guarantee its title. It is true you can not maintain an action against the Government of the United States on a warranty. That is all true; but does it behoove a great Government that had its citizens' money when it put them in possession of the land, after they have been ousted and compelled to respond to a superior title, to say, "Oh, you only paid us $1.25 an acre twelve or fifteen years ago, and therefore you must take $1.25 an acre now?" The citizen replies, "I paid you $1.25 an acre, and I paid your grantee, who held the title when you sold it to me in violation of law and good faith, $3.50 an acre in addition." The committee thought it was fair and just to say, "What you have paid to this grantee of the United States we refund to you."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this amendment strikes me, as compared with the House bill, as more and more unique. The House bill provided for reimbursing the purchase-money to those people to whom patents had been issued erroneously and reimbursing what they gave, just as the rule of damages is between private persons on covenants of seizin. This amendment departs from the use of the phrase to whom patents have been issued, but allows to anybody, settler, homesteader, purchaser, or anybody else, without regard to whether he has a title from the United States or not, the amount specified. Until they had had their claims examined and their patents issued these settlers stood like everybody else who settles on what are said to be public lands, in the attitude of people who took at their own risk; and therefore if any of these persons who have proceeded to purchase these lands or to settle upon them have been ousted before they have got what appears to be a title from the United States, they are just like a great many other people, who, wishing to get in a good place, swarm onto lands and it finally turns out that the title is not good, that they had no right to be there. The House bill guarded against that; but this amendment departs from it entirely. I do not think that is a very good thing to do.

Now when we come to the other part of the bill as to the price to be paid, the amendment of the Senate committee departs from the House bill, which provided the basis of not exceeding three and a half dollars and what they had given for the land as the reimbursement. The amendment allows three dollars and a half to everybody, which would operate as a great speculation to many people who purchased under pre-emption and otherwise as a mere speculation and who had not built up any betterments or done anything else, so that if I had been luckily engaged in land speculation and had bought ten or fifteen thousand acres of this land at a dollar and a quarter an acre and waiting for a rise, put no improvements upon it, I should make a speculation of $2.25 an acre clear profit, laying out of the interest, which you always do when you invest in land that is not productive. So these purchasers ought not to be provided for in that way, and, as the Senator from Arkansas has well said, there is no instance that I know of in the history of the Government, certainly none that I ever saw, and there are hundreds here the other way, that when a title of a purchaser of land who has got his patent from the United States filed, all that the United States have ever done from the beginning down is to reimburse him the money that he paid, or else to give him a land certificate, or something, to go and locate somewhere else on land open to pre-emption at the same rate.

Why is this innovation started and why is it started, particularly when so far as we yet know we have not any report or information from the Secretary of the Interior? There is no report from the committee in writing. Do we know now what is the real history of this transaction in the Department?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There have been reports in the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses in regard to this matter. And there have been recommendations of this by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by the Secretary of the Interior. This bill has been passed in this shape three times, and the House put on a proposition not to exceed $3.50 an acre in cases where there had been no judgment rendered, and hence it was necessary to introduce this as an amendment to the House bill on account of the reason the Senator has stated, that the case may be examined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The five minutes of the Senator from Vermont are out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I object to the consideration of the bill. I do not propose to vote $250,000 by unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that these people have a title and they have an equitable title. Every one of them has a certificate from the Government declaring that it is the owner of the land and that they have paid for it, or else the Government has allowed them to file a homestead claim upon the land and live upon it, which the Attorney-General recently within a few years declared was such a title as the Government could not interfere with when they accepted the homesteader's filing and segregated it from the public lands.

As to the speculation that the Senator speaks of, if he had listened to me he would have heard that I stated that every man who is relieved under this bill had paid $3.50 an acre to the grantee of the railroad company. So they are not getting their money back. They are not getting what they paid for the land. They are out either $6 or $4.75 an acre, every one of them, unless he is a homesteader.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the objection for the purpose of allowing the debate to go on.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Colorado stated that all these persons who were entitled to recover under the provisions of this act had paid three and a half dollars an acre to the grantees of the railroad company. Now, if the title of the persons holding from the railroad company failed, why should not that money be recovered from the grantor of the persons for whom this is alleged to be a protection? I can not understand why the Government should be called upon to pay what some extortionate speculator may have seen fit to charge a settler, for these lands were all bought from the railroad company.

Mr. TELLER. When the Supreme Court of the United States declared that this man Knevals, who had bought——

Mr. INGALLS. What was the title of that case?

Mr. TELLER. Van Wyck vs. Knevals. When the Supreme Court of the United States decided——

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long ago?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know. When the Supreme Court of the United States decided that this title was in Mr. Kenevals and not in the Government, that it was in the railroad company at the time the Government said to these settlers, "We take your money; go upon this land." Mr. Knevals said to the settlers, "Now, I have got the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States to put you off; if you do not want to go off, come up here and pay." There were men there who had everything they owned on the face of the earth upon it. There were men there who had lived upon that land and made it their homes for fifteen years, had put there fences and their houses and their homes; and when Mr. Knevals said, "for the purpose of having no more trouble about this I will take $3.50 an acre," they walked up and gave it. If they did not want to do it they abandoned the land, but those who abandoned their claims are not the parties covered by this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly then the want of conscience on the part of Mr. Knevals should not be the measure of justice that the United States Government should deal out to these settlers.

Mr. TELLER. There was no want of conscience on the part of Mr. Knevals. He had the title of the United States Government. The want of conscience is on the part of the Government of the United States, that had sold this land to these people and now declines to make good its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any betterment law in Nebraska?

Mr. TELLER. It does not make any difference about the betterment law. These men were compelled to pay this or quit. They preferred to pay it, and therefore it is a fair indication that the value of the land is what they paid. Mr. Knevals has asked no extortionate price, there is no pretense of that anywhere. On the contrary, it is understood that he made a reduction in favor of these settlers that he was not required to do, and the land is worth more money than that to-day, and it is now said that the settler who has already paid $6 per acre is extorting from the Government when he gets $3.50, that which he paid to the Government's grantee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to, goes over under the rule.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask consent to continue the bill. I appeal to the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again submit the question to the Senate. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont, I appeal to the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his objection at this time to the consideration of the bill. I do it for the reason that this effort at reimbursement of this very serious loss to these settlers has been pending in this body for years. It has received, I think, in both Houses of Congress very full examination, and I hope that the consideration may go on to-day that the matter may be fully understood and the bill be acted upon. I fear that under this objection, if it passes away to-day, that will be the end of any relief to these parties who have been injured by the action of the Government at this session of Congress, and I again appeal to the Senator to withdraw his objection and permit the consideration of the bill to go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I speak a minute, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is against the rule, but several Senators have violated it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I can not withdraw the objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the Senator from Vermont be permitted to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Vermont may continue the debate without respect to the rule. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. One moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only need one minute.

Mr. INGALLS. If this bill is to be considered, I ask that the rule may be enforced as to all or abandoned as to all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not expect the bill to be considered, but I ask one minute to reply to the appeal of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to gratify him; but here comes this bill with a very heavy amount of money, without any report present, without a paper from any Department present, without the decision of the Supreme Court present, and nobody seems to know where it is or where it is to be found, and without any information except the enthusiasm and the judgment of my friend from Colorado and the Senator from Nebraska. That is not the proper way, as it seems to me, to make us understand this bill; and if I can have time enough to look up these papers myself which ought to have been here I certainly shall make no objection to the bill going on when there can be free discussion of it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope that may be done.

Mr. TELLER. I venture to say, though it may be out of order, that the case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals is one of the most noted cases that the Supreme Court has ever decided. It settled questions that I supposed every lawyer in the United States was familiar with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill will be stated.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. PLUMB. If it is in order I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Order of Business 1563, being the bill (S. 2516) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., was objected to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who subsequently withdrew his objection. I desire that the bill should have its place on the Calendar, and I shall at the proper time ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration. If it comes up, I ask that it be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has its place on the Calendar just where it was before.

SARAH E. NORTON.

The bill (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah E. Norton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "rebellion," to insert the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month;" so that the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah H. Norton, a volunteer nurse during the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. KINCAID.

The bill (S. 2424) granting an increase of pension to George W. Kincaid was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of George W. Kincaid, war of 1812, to $30 per month.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Pensions, June 22, 1886, but before concluding was interrupted by—

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Vermont to withdraw the application for reading the report, which is quite a long one. This man is over ninety years old, a veteran of the war of 1812, and utterly destitute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Secretary need not read the petition which is embodied in the report. The statement of the committee is very brief. I think it had better appear for future reasons as well as for present consideration.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2424) granting an increase of pension to George William Kincaid, have examined the same, and report as follows:

The committee have examined the papers in this case with very great interest. It is an application for increase of pension by a soldier of the war of 1812, and who is now fast verging to the close of a century of life, having been born in 1790.

The claimant enlisted on the 28th of December, 1812, and was discharged on March 15, 1815, upon the certificate of Surgeon T. Watkins, by reason of disabilities incurred by diseased liver and pulmonary affection.

The claim was rejected on the ground that no certificate could be found on file, and that there was no evidence identifying the claimant as the solder performing the service alleged.

The claimant for increase is already a pensioner under the acts and supplements thereto giving pension to soldiers of the war of 1812.

He is utterly and entirely destitute, and for many years has been wholly dependent upon his neighbors for care and subsistence, as the evidence discloses in a petition signed by numerous citizens, and herewith appended as a part of this report:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The petition of the subscribers, citizens of Richland County, Ohio, respectfully showeth that George W. Kincaid, whose residence for a great many years has been Belleville, Richland County, Ohio, was a soldier of the war of 1812; that his only means of support for many years has been the pension of $8 per month granted to the soldiers of that war. They further represent that in consequence of his great age, being now about ninety-six years of age, he has become so helpless that he requires the constant care and attendance of a nurse; that for several years this additional expense has been borne by his neighbors, as he has no family or relatives able to support him. In view of his services to his country, and his great age and helplessness, we respectfully ask that his pension be increased to $30 per month, which will barely pay the expense of his support for the remainder of his life.

And as in duty bound, we will ever pray, &c.

B. F. Hines, Wm. Gerloch, H. Farber, H. L. Maury, O. E. Oberlin, Irwin Fisher, R. J. Hubbill, Eli L. Hess, Reuben Evarts, Ben. O. Smith, O. S. Hawley, Gustav Etz, J. M. Reed, Wm. Long, U. F. Armstrong, C. V. Morrow, Wm. C. Beattie, T. A. Swonger, A. W. Lewis, J. J. Charles, Wm. Le Fever, Leroy Le Fever, J. M. Alexander, J. R. Tennan, D. A. Lanehart, J. H. Burkholder, E. L. Garber, Wm. H. A. Raudebaugh, C. J. Brown, E. A. Brown, C. A. Lafferty, John Winemiller, S. B. Donel, M. Sharp, J. C. Potts, C. B. Walters, C. Strome, A. E. Shafer, Cyrus Gatton, B. Scott, W. A. Black, Cyrus Day, Wm. F. Madden, B. J. Levins, A. M. Young, C. N. Ink, W. H. Batterson, D. M. Teeter, A. G. Fans, J. C. Nelson, Charles Etz, J. P. Walsh, B. F. Greely, J. Jay Dean, R. W. Bell, J. W. Kelly, O. H. Gurney, A. Cunningham, Bent Charles, O. Howard, Henry Spain, Daniel Walker, W. H. Smith, H. O. Sheidley, Chas. Purcell, Jacob Winemeller, Wm. F. Charles, J. F. Greely, Aaron Leedy, J. S. Garber, John Gatton, J. W. Rhinehalt, Calvin Robinson, D. L. Young, George Rhein, B. C. Brown, Dr. W. T. McMahon, A. Fitz-John, J. E. Howard, Frank Shafer, A. J. Flahartry, M. L. Bonar, J. V. Oberlin, H. L. Canfield, D. J. Rummel, H. C. McCluer.

In his own sworn statement made before Hon. John Meredith, probate judge of Richland County, Ohio, on the 20th day of January, 1861, the veteran claimant qualifies as to his own identity as the same Kincaid who was a sergeant in Captain Barnard's company, Fourteenth United States Infantry, during the war with Great Britain declared in 1812. That his disabilities were incurred at Sackett's Harbor, New York, while in the line of duty, from which he has never recovered. For three years after his discharge he resided in Baltimore, and was treated for said disease of the liver by Surgeon Watkins, long since deceased. That he lived at other places for short intervals, and has been treated by other physicians, but received no benefit therefrom.

His first application for the required increase of pension was made in 1861, and he testifies that the long delay in seeking aid from the Government arose from his ignorance of the rules of the Department and the law. In June, 1862, for some unknown reason, not stated in the records on file in the Pension Office, the further progress of the case was suspended. He comes now before Congress for the relief which, in the opinion of the committee, he should have had long years ago.

In further proof of his identity the records of the Third Auditor's Office for September, 1835, the accounts of Paymaster Dobbin, United States Army, show George William Kincaid to have been a sergeant of Captain Barnard's company, Fourteenth United States Infantry, the dates of his enlistment, discharge, and the reason for the same.

Further, the following certificate from Captain McIlvaine is to the minds of the committee conclusive:

I do hereby certify upon my word and honor as a late officer and a gentleman that I know George William Kincaid, and that he served in the Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry faithfully and honestly in the late war, and that he was under my command as an attendant at the recruiting headquarters in Baltimore, and that I left him doing duty in the office under Colonel Lane and Captain Cummings in 1814.

WM. McILVAINE,
Late Captain in the Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry.

WHITE HALL, BALTIMORE COUNTY, July 18, 1835.

Samuel B. Hugo, a surgeon's mate in the war of 1812, certifies to his personal knowledge as to the service of the claimant in that war.

In January, 1861, Drs. H. O. Mack and S. M. Chandler made a personal examination of the claimant's condition, and found him suffering from chronic derangement of the liver, and by reason of this and a combination of diseases to be totally disabled from obtaining a living by manual labor.

In view, therefore, of the foregoing testimony, which is conclusive to the committee as to the merits of the case, and from the great age of the claimant, they recommend the speedy passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW MUCKLIN.

The bill (S. 2487) granting a pension to Andrew Mucklin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Andrew Mucklin, late of Battery C, Fifth Regiment United States Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN B. FULLER.

The bill (S. 2488) granting a pension to John B. Fuller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of John B. Fuller, late a private in Company A, Twenty-seventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREMISES LEASED FOR POST-OFFICES.

The bill (S. 2727) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for the use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained and a statement of the number of post-offices that will be covered and leased, and the cost thereof.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I can not state the number, but——

Mr. HALE. The bill can not pass without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, objection being made to its consideration.

THOMAS B. SHAW.

The bill (S. 2551) granting an increase of pension to Thomas B. Shaw was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported amendments, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty;" and in the same line, after the word "month," to insert "in lieu of the pension he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas B. Shaw, of Port Huron, Mich., and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read in that case. It is short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER June 23, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2551) granting an increase of pension to Thomas B. Shaw, have examined the same, and report:

The petitioner was a corporal in Company H, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteers. He was discharged May 25, 1866; filed his original application for pension April 9, 1880. He was first pensioned at the rate of $2 a month, which was increased from time to time until he is now receiving $12 a month.

His disabilities consist of rheumatism, scurvy, varicose veins, and hernia, in reference to the incurrence of which there is a mass of testimony of the most reliable character.

From the evidence on file, including that of the examining surgeons, it is apparent that the man is not only nearly helpless—utterly disqualified to labor for his support—but he is also a great sufferer.

In his petition to Congress he avers that he was not justly dealt with by the Pension Office, where he states his application was held without action on account of a lack of clerical force.

Sixty of the best citizens of Port Huron certify to his condition and to his worthiness, and to their belief that he is inadequately pensioned, and in this opinion the committee feel bound to concur. Rheumatism, scurvy, hernia, varicose veins, swelled almost to bursting, are known to be exceedingly disabling, and in this case their existence is proven and their effects are apparent.

In view of the fact that the claimant's application has repeatedly received the favorable action of the Pension Office; that there is no question whatever as to his having incurred disabilities in the service, and believing, as the committee do, that the pension he is now receiving is not adequate to his condition and need, the bill is reported with an amendment, substituting the word "twenty" for the word "twelve," in the seventh line, and adding after the word "month," in the seventh line, "in lieu of the pension he is now receiving," with a recommendation that it do pass.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LORENZO A. CLARK.

The bill (S. 1051) granting a pension to L. A. Clark was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported amendments, in line 6, to strike out the initial "L" and insert "Lorenzo;" and in line 7, before "Indiana," to strike out "One hundred and twelfth" and insert "Twelfth;" so as to make the bill read:

Clark, of Harbor Springs, Mich., late of Company A, Twelfth Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

ANNIE E. GARDINER.

The bill (S. 2660) granting a pension to Annie E. Gardiner was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment, in line 7, after the word "Army," to strike out "and pay her a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month, from and after the passage of this act," and insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month, from and after the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie E. Gardiner, widow of John W. T. Gardiner, late a major on the retired-list of the United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR June 23, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2660) granting a pension to Annie E. Gardiner, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant, Annie E. Gardiner, is the widow of John W. T. Gardiner, late a major United States Army. He was educated at West Point, and appointed brevet second lieutenant July 1, 1840, and served until retired November 14, 1861, "for disability resulting from exposure in line of duty." He died September 24, 1879.

His widow applied for a pension November 24, 1879, but it was rejected June 20, 1885, on the ground that as the fatal cause of soldier's death originated prior to March 4, 1861, during the time of peace, there is no title to pension, the law requiring that it must have originated during a period of war.

It appears that the soldier died of rheumatic gout, and it also appears from the certificates of physicians that he was treated for this disease as early as 1852. There are also further statements, which seem to be reliable, showing the origin of the difficulty prior to the fall and winter of 1848-'49. Dr. J. F. Head, surgeon United States Army, testifies that he was stationed at Fort Snelling in 1849 with the soldier, and he was under his professional care, and had been subject to attacks of rheumatic gout for a year or two before.

This evidence indicates that the disability was probably contracted during the period of the Mexican war; but however that may be, it would be difficult to give a reason why a soldier should be pensioned for a disability contracted in time of war and not pensioned for a like disability contracted in the service and line of duty in time of peace. Although the action of the Pension Office was legally correct, there can be no reason why, in the discretion of Congress, this widow should not be relieved from the inequitable operation of the rule, especially in view of the probability, from the sworn testimony, that this case may properly be considered within it.

We are inclined to give this widow the benefit of the doubt, and therefore report back the bill with a recommendation that it do pass with an amendment; striking out all after the word "Army," in the seventh line, and insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HELEN PLUNKETT.

The bill (S. 757) granting a pension to Helen Plunkett was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment, in line 6, after the name "Plunkett," to insert "Company A, Twenty-first Massachusetts Volunteers;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Helen Plunkett, widow of Sergt. Thomas Plunkett, Company A, Twenty-first Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know some reason why that pension is put at $30 a month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR June 23, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 757) granting a pension to Helen Plunkett, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant, Helen Plunkett, is the widow of Thomas Plunkett, a member of Company E, Twenty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers. He enlisted July 19, 1861, and served until discharged, March 9, 1864, as stated in the original certificate on file, on account of "amputation of both arms in consequence of gunshot wound received at battle of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, while rescuing the colors of his regiment; is unfit for Invalid Corps, and disability total." This order was made by command of Major-General Dix.

He applied to the Department for a pension, which was granted at $8 per month; this was afterward increased to $25, then to $31.25, then to $50, and finally to $72, from June 17, 1878.

It appears from a report of S. G. Davis, special examiner, made at the direction of the Pension Office, that the pensioner, Thomas Plunkett, died March 10, 1885, aged forty-four years; "disease, or cause of death, chronic inflammation of stomach and bowels."

Sergeant Plunkett, as he was familiarly known, was born in Ireland in 1840, and came to this country in 1845. He was a corporal and then sergeant of Company A, Twenty-first Massachusetts Volunteers. At the battle of Fredericksburg the regiment was ordered to charge, and passed a terrific fire from the rebel batteries. The color-sergeant was shot. Sergeant Plunkett raised the colors, bore them to the front, raised the staff in the air, when both his arms were struck and torn away by a shell. He bore his calamity for more than twenty years with invincible patience and cheerfulness, and died March 10, 1885.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR appeared before your committee and made a brief statement, from which we extract the following:

"The bill to which I desire to call your attention is one granting a pension to Helen Plunkett, the widow of Sergt. Thomas Plunkett, who was, without any dispute, in my opinion, the most famous and the most representative Massachusetts soldier of the late war. In making this statement I do not forget the high character and fame of our very great and able general officers whom we contributed to the service like other States. Sergeant Plunkett was an Irishman; a man who enlisted very early in the war, and during its progress performed some very important and brilliant exploits, deeds of personal heroism, which have made him famous. He bore his wounds with unfailing heroism, courage, and patience until the end. It was at one time proposed to give him a commission, and a high one, in the Army; but Governor Andrew said: 'No; let him go down in history as Sergeant Plunkett, as Sergeant Jasper has come down to us in the history of the Revolution.' May I be permitted to read a few sentences from an address which I delivered at the two hundredth anniversary of Worcester, Mass., October 14, 1884, just before Sergeant Plunkett's death?

"'We need not go outside of our own local history for proof of the courage and soldierly quality of the Irish race. We need not recount the history of a hundred foreign battlefields where their valor has given victory to a flag which to them was only the emblem of oppression. We need not revert to our Revolutionary annals to remember Montgomery, or trace the lineage of Andrew Jackson, or name the name of Sheridan, the illustrious soldier at the head of our Army to-day. When the news came of the dishonor of our flag at Sumter, the prompt enlistment of the Emmett Guards, the first organization of foreign blood, one of the very first of any blood, that marched to the war has been well said to be "a representative fact of the very highest importance to the permanent character of our Government." Who can read, without tears of joy and pride and thanksgiving to Almighty God that He has given such men to be his countrymen, the story of the death of O'Neil, that natural gentleman who said when he was dying, "Write to my dear mother and tell her I die for my country. I wish I had two lives to give. Let the Union flag be wrapped about me and a fold of it laid under my head;" of the devoted and tender McConville, who died at Cold Harbor with the name of his mother on his lips; of him (Sergeant Plunkett) who gave both arms to save the flag of the country he loved, and whose stout and constant heart has never yet regretted the sacrifice.'

"I hope your committee will give in this case all that you can with propriety. It seems to me that if we can pension the widows of general officers and admirals and others of high station, who in some cases have not been remarkably conspicuous among the men of their rank for distinguished military service, that the wisdom and patriotism of this committee can find and will find some mode of bestowing this mark of special honor upon this man whom we recognize in our State—you have your own heroes—as our representative soldier, and the pride in whom of our citizens is increased by the fact that he is a man who represents the patriotism and service of our adopted citizens."

In recommending the passage of this bill the committee desire that it be understood that while there is a diversity of opinion in the body of the committee as to the propriety of a bill of this kind, yet they consent that it shall be reported to the Senate with a full statement of the facts, and placing it upon its own merits so as to prevent its being a precedent in other cases.

The statement of Senator HOAR shows that Sergeant Plunkett, by reason of his conspicuous gallantry, sacrifice, and suffering for his country, has come to fill, in the minds of the soldiers and, in fact, of the people of the whole of the great Commonwealth where he resided and died, a unique position as the model and ideal representative of the volunteer in the ranks of the armies which saved the Republic.

In the opinion of the committee a sound public policy as well as the irresistible impulses of generous and patriotic natures demand this small tribute to a sentiment honorable to our people, and the exhibition of which upon appropriate occasions will stimulate others to the performance of heroic deeds in times to come.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Willbur resulting from any changes made in the weight and character of said tiling from that which was specified in the contract of said James M. Willbur with Bartlett, Robbins & Co.

Willbur for all extra expense resulting from changes made in weight and character of tiling frames and supports furnished from that specified in the original contract between the United States and Bartlett, Robbins & Co.

TRIAL BY JURY TO PENSION CLAIMANTS.

The bill (S. 816) to give the right of trial by jury to claimants of pensions, under the laws of the United States, whose applications have been rejected by the Secretary of the Interior on appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that had better go over. It will lead to discussion.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the bill be read, with the report, so as to give an idea of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are but five minutes left for the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the report be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BLAIR. I will just say in relation to this bill—and I shall be glad of the attention of the Senate—that this is a bill which has been reported by the Committee on Pensions in the hope that it might relieve Congress of the great proportion of the special acts which we are called upon to consider, and the consideration of which during the present Congress has led to a state of feeling that I need not enlarge upon.

Probably nineteen-twentieths of the cases which we are called upon to consider are in the nature of appeals from the decision of the Department of the Interior. They arise under the general law. They reach us by reason of defect of proof or friction in the operation of the existing pension machinery. The object of this bill is to make provision that after an applicant has carried his case through the Pension Office and on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior until it is finally disallowed, so that it is in that condition where naturally of right it comes to us without objection on the part of anybody, he may have the right, instead of coming here, to appeal to the United States district court in the district where he resides, and have the benefit of whatever may have been placed on file in the prosecution of his claim here at Washington, and then the privilege of trying his case there by the court, or, if he desires it, by a jury of his countrymen. If he make out a case, then, upon judgment being rendered by the district court in his favor, his name shall be placed on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as in other cases which arise under the general laws of the United States. If he can not do that, if he can not satisfy a jury of his neighbors that his name ought to be placed on the roll, that is the end of it. He will have had the exercise of the great right of trial by jury, and that will be the end of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. What about costs?

Mr. BLAIR. There is no proposition in regard to costs. The costs will be very slight in any event. An amendment can provide for that matter. The bill says nothing about costs. There is one slight amendment that I wish to have go in the RECORD. I should like the bill, with the report and this proposed amendment, to be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to give the right of trial by jury to claimants of pensions, under the laws of the United States, whose applications have been rejected by the Secretary of the Interior on appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases of applications for pensions, under the laws of the United States, which shall have been rejected on appeal from the decision of the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior, the claimant of the pension, or his legal representative to the right of the pension, may file his petition in the district court of the United States in the district wherein he resides, for the pension, setting forth, with other necessary averments, the rejection of his claim by the Secretary of the Interior; and thereupon the court shall hear and try his cause, and such proceedings shall be had as in other cases, including the trial by jury whenever the claimant demands it, and the right of appeal to the higher courts upon questions of law and fact; and upon the hearing the claimant shall have the right to use all evidence, documents, and papers of every description which have been filed in the proceedings before the Commissioner of Pensions and Secretary of the Interior; and all record or other evidence in possession of the Government, or copies thereof, shall be furnished, on application by the claimant, for use in such proceedings in the district court.

The amendment of Mr. BLAIR is to add the following section:

When final judgment shall have been rendered in such court in favor of the claimant, a certified copy of the judgment shall be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, and the name of the claimant shall thereupon be placed upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws as in other cases where pensions are granted under the provisions of the general pension laws.

The report of the Committee on Pensions is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 816) to give the right of trial by jury to claimants of pensions under the laws of the United States whose applications have been rejected by the Secretary of the Interior on appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions, have considered the same, and report herewith the bill, and recommend its passage.

A great number of pension claims, after years of earnest prosecution at great expense to the parties, are finally rejected by the Department, often where the evidence is very conflicting and great doubt exists of the justice of the decision. The methods of trial, substantially ex parte and without the advantage of personal examination of the party and witnesses in presence of the tribunal which decides the cause, can not be remedied under the present system of adjudication. Yet, the rights concluded are of much greater pecuniary importance than the ordinary amounts involved in litigation, and to the soldier, his widow, minor children, and dependent relatives the determination of these questions generally involve the comforts of life and not unfrequently existence itself.

The great mass of applications for relief by special legislation grow out of the dissatisfaction of claimants who have prosecuted their claims for many years under the greatest difficulties with the final, and as they believe, unjust decision of their claims. Consequently they come to Congress, and their petitions must be heard. The present session there have been more than 4,500 bills for special acts of pension introduced in the two Houses of Congress—3,788 in the House and 764 in the Senate—and probably not less than 5,000 will be introduced before the Congress ends. Of these 618 have passed the Congress. How many will become laws is unknown to the committee. Probably at least nineteen-twentieths of the bills are substantially appeals from the decision of the Pension Office.

There is every reason to believe that this army of petitioners for redress will increase annually for many years. There is no escape from the consideration of these cases by Congress or by some local tribunal, with opportunity to examine the parties, witnesses, and proof, and decide finally upon these controversies.

We can conceive of no possible reason why the trial by jury should not be allowed to these applicants, since it is insured by constitutional provisions in every other case of vested rights. No other tribunal but the regular judiciary of the country can settle, to final satisfaction, these claims. We believe that the passage of this bill would substantially remove the overwhelming labor which oppresses the Congress and the Executive with a work which can neither be ignored nor yet satisfactorily performed.

The great mass of cases would still continue to be finally decided by the Department of Interior, which, notwithstanding the imperfections inherent in the system, is able to adjudicate satisfactorily upon claims under the pension laws; but something must be done to provide for those who now come to Congress for relief, and in most cases with righteous demands, under the general laws, which they have not been able to establish to the satisfaction of the Department which is compelled to try their causes under every embarrassment and difficulty surrounding the forms of investigation and the formation of just conclusions in the premises.

ROCK CREEK PARK.

Mr. CONGER. I made an objection to Order of Business 1596, being Senate bill 2584, because I thought the Senator from Kansas who reported it was not in his seat. I am in favor of the bill, and I withdraw the objection, and ask that it take its place next on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the bill will be taken up.
